“Your heart already knows what choice you should make, but you still refuse to admit it. I can’t imagine why.” He shook his head. “I’ll return in… when I feel like it.” He swirled a finger, pointing it at the ceiling. “You’d better help your king out of here and let the rest know he's alive. From what I can tell, there's a lot going on in the compound above." He smacked his lips together. "The Dark Moths are in an uproar…" The Devil let the words die and he vanished, leaving me, Kade, and Wrythe alone with the dusty remains of the dead Society members and Peter's corpse.

At the thought of Peter, my heart sank. He'd been a friend. I cared about him. And even though the other Society members hadn't been good, they still hadn't deserved the end the Devil gave them. He'd obliterated them, turned them to dust like demons when they died.

Then I thought of what I'd seen on one of the floors above. The Dark Moth Society minus Peter and Wrythe had been as evil as any demons I'd slain, but it still hurt that they were dead. At least I hoped Peter and Wrythe weren't involved. But that might be naïve.

The Queen of Hearts, that's what the trainees called me. And they were right. I was all up in my feelings. I needed to get a handle on myself and fight through it. Wrythe needed to be saved as did the rest of the Society. Steeling myself, I decided not to think of the bright swirling lights and the voices and all the other crap happening around me, and just focus on what needed to be done.

"Alice," Kade began slowly, but I held up a hand.

"Help me get Wrythe up," I said, trying not to think about what could never be between Kade and I. Determined, I squatted beside Wrythe. "Let's get you out of here," I said.

Stupid life, I thought, ferociously.

Kade tried again. "Please. I wanted to tell you, but I wasn't at liberty to share. My orders—" Kade stopped abruptly and growled.

"I don't give a damn about your orders," I seethed, getting an arm around Wrythe.

Kade put an arm around the king's other side. "Neither do I. Not anymore," he said with finality.

That was something, but I wasn't sure whether it was too little too late, if he could do anything except follow orders.

We hefted Wrythe up together.

The king groaned.

“Be careful,” I said, feeling overprotective.

“I’m going to free him.” Kade moved one of his fingers over the metal cuff shackling Wrythe to the wall. A spark of white light flared from the metal before the manacle broke. Wrythe’s arm fell with a thud and he moaned, the movement snapping him back to consciousness.

“Sire,” I said, keeping one shoulder under his arm to hold him upright.

“Alice? You’re safe?” Wrythe asked, surprised. Now that the troll manacle wasn’t holding him, he began to heal almost immediately.

“Yes,” I said. “I’m fine.” Worry and relief for Wrythe replaced my wrath. “I’m so sorry I got you into this, sire.” I helped him take a step. “Do you think you can make it to the elevator?”

“I can try,” Wrythe said.

Kade put his shoulder under Wrythe’s other side and together we helped him walk.

“Your wounds should heal quickly now. The troll magic in the cuff was keeping you from doing so before,” Kade said, his words labored as he worked to help Wrythe out of the cell.

“I can feel the change already,” Wrythe admitted.

“How did you do that?” I asked Kade across Wrythe, dropping the orb back in my boot.

“I’m an angel. There are things I can do,” Kade admitted. “So can you,” he added softly.

I studied him a moment, hoping he would tell me more. He didn’t.

Wrythe did his best to help us walk him to the elevator. He obviously didn’t enjoy being hurt, not that I could blame him.

At the elevator, I pushed the button. “What should we do about Peter’s body, sire?” I asked, keeping my voice quiet.

“I’ll bring him up, if you think you can handle Wrythe on your own?” Kade said.

“Sure,” I responded, grateful for once that he could teleport. “Take him to Heathcliff’s office. His body will need to be prepared for burial.”

“I will.” Kade strode back the way we’d come.

Inside the elevators, the doors closed and I pushed the button that would take us up to the main floor of the compound. The whirring of the pulley system as we went up forced me to return to the task at hand. My muscles whined as I held on to Wrythe. I was strong, but he was freaking heavy. “Sire, we need to talk,” I said, desperate to lay out the whole affair with the dead Society members.

“We’re way past the sire stage, Alice,” he said, gritting his teeth. “But tell me what’s going on.”

“Very well.” I told him about how the Devil had killed Skye and Ewan and the others. After I finished, Wrythe explained that the other Dark Moth council members had killed Peter. At that, anger burned along my veins, but not enough to bring the red glow to my skin.

“There’s no one left on the council, except you,” I said. Then shook my head. My heart ached. “I’m so sorry, sire. This is all my fault. If I hadn’t insisted in participating in the Trial of Three, we wouldn’t be in this mess.”

“True, but then I wouldn’t have known about the council’s traitorous betrayal of the Dark Moths. It’s better to know the truth, no matter how bitter, than to remain in darkness, don’t you think?”

I didn’t know. “I guess,” I said wanting to be supportive.

Wrythe tried to stand on his own, then groaned in pain. “None of this is your fault, Alice. You should know that.” He sagged against me.

I grunted, hefting him up further on my shoulder. “I’m taking you to Heathcliff right away. He’ll get you fixed up and then…” I let my words trail off because I didn’t know what would happen next. I was glad I wasn’t in his position. My king had an insurmountable task in front of him, but I would support him in any way he needed—if he still wanted me around. I'd wrecked everything he'd built. It would make sense that he would want me out of the picture, especially since I still had to choose between his life and Kade's.

I closed my eyes. I just wanted it all to go away! The trials, the Society, even Kade. In that moment, I didn't want to have to deal with any of it. As those thoughts bounced around in my mind, a white light flashed behind my eyes. I blinked furiously, trying to focus.

"Alice." The female voice cut through my mind. The voice sounded familiar, but I couldn't place it. I opened my eyes, searching the small elevator for the person who'd spoken. There wasn't anyone else. "Did you hear that?" I asked Wrythe, just to be sure I really was losing my mind.

"What?" His face was ashen, and I tugged at his shirt, anxious to make sure he didn't pass out.

The elevator opened.

"Nothing," I said and hurried as quickly as possible to Heathcliff's office. We'd made it without a single interruption, which surprised me, but I wasn't going to complain. With a grunt, I pushed open Heathcliff's office door. Inside, the Doc was attending Grayson, another Dark Moth. He'd been sired by a Gluttony demon, and he'd given me some pointers during combat training one time which had really helped, but that was all I really knew about him. We hadn't had a real conversation, but he seemed nice enough and I admired his double sword-wielding skills.

I helped Wrythe over to them.

Grayson glanced up, his face filled with pain. It was obvious why. A long gash began at his right shoulder and ran down his torso, ending at his left hip. "Pride demon," he said simply, tapping his chest gingerly. "Don't worry, I took him out." He gave Wrythe a once over. "What the hell happened to you?" It was apparent Grayson had been out on a hunt and hadn't heard what had gone down in the compound.

I contemplated Heathcliff, unsure what to say.

Heathcliff sent a large needle through Grayson's wound, causing the man to cry out in pain. Then the Doc glanced at Wrythe. "Over there," he said, indicating the unused bed as he tied off the stitches and placed a bandage over Grayson's wound. "You'll need to rest," he said to the Dark Moth warrior. "The more you do, the swifter you'll heal and the less likely it'll be that you scar." The Doc had a serious aversion to Moths he worked on ending up with a scar. I guessed it had to do with him taking pride in his work.

Grayson carefully hopped off the bed he'd been lying on. "Will do, Doc." He grabbed his shredded shirt and tossed it in the trash. "Hope you're feeling better soon, sire."

"Thank you, Grayson. And you as well," Wrythe responded as Grayson stepped out.

Heathcliff helped me get Wrythe up on the bed after it was quickly cleaned. When Wrythe was lying down, Heathcliff glanced at me. "What happened? I never did find Pops."

"The compound is warded against certain supernatural creatures," I said, repeating what Kade had told me. Taking the scissors the Doc handed me, I carefully cut away at Wrythe's dirty shirt. Beneath were several ugly gashes and wounds. They were already beginning to heal, which wasn't good since they still hadn't been cleaned.

"My favorite shirt," Wrythe growled, trying to smile. It didn't take.

"I'm sorry, sire," I said, glancing into his gray eyes a moment before returning to my task.

"It's fine, Alice. I was kidding," Wrythe said, and coughed.

"Either way, though. I've caused you so much trouble. With the council and especially Peter…" At the mention of Peter, my heart lurched.

Wrythe squeezed my shoulder. "Don't do that, Alice. Don't blame yourself.”

Heathcliff returned with a solution in a silver basin. He tossed a cloth in the solution and then handed the basin to me. “Clean his wounds. I’ve got to make up an elixir.”

“Okay.” I began dabbing at the biggest laceration. Wrythe sucked in a breath and ground his teeth at the pain. The cut went from his left shoulder, across his chest, and ended at his right hip. “Sorry. Sorry.” I tried to be more careful.

Wrythe placed one of his large hands over mine. “Stop apologizing. I owe you my life, Alice Blackburn.” Something crossed his face, an emotion I didn’t recognize. “Thank you.”

I shook my head and went back to my work.

Wrythe’s grip on my hand moved up to my shoulder and he pulled me toward him so my face was directly above his. “Alice,” he said, his eyes trained on mine. “I don’t love easily, but I do love you.” As soon as he finished speaking, he kissed me.

OceanofPDF.com

SHOCK KEPT ME FROM RECIPROCATING. The kiss was so unexpected and his words even more so. After a quick moment, I found myself kissing him back. His lips soft and inviting. But just as quickly, I stepped back.

One side of his mouth lifted in a half smile. “I’ve wanted to do that for days.” He dropped his head back against the table and his eyes closed. “Your lips taste like…” He began to breathe deeply. Had he fallen asleep?

I wouldn’t blame him after all he’d been through. “Sire,” I whispered, placing a hand on his shoulder.

Heathcliff came to stand beside me. “He’s fine. I gave him a solution that possesses magical properties and encourage Moths into an unconscious state.” He gave me a wry smile. “I’m happy it worked,” he said, pressing one of the king’s eyes open to verify the man was actually out. When Doc was satisfied, he went on. “Now he doesn’t have to suffer through the pain while I stitch him up.”

“Magic?” I whispered. He hadn’t used such a mixture on any of the other Moths he’d taken care of in the past—at least not that I’d seen.

“It’s a new discovery thanks to a friend of mine.” He smiled lightly. “Her name is Cinderella though she goes by Cindy. She teaches at a school in another realm.”

“She’s a teacher?” I asked, my fingers finding my lips as I was preoccupied with the way the king’s mouth moved against mine.

“And one of the best witches I’ve ever met,” he added, preparing the needle and then dabbing Wrythe’s wound.

“Okay then.” I had no reason to doubt Heathcliff.

While Doc got to work, I watched, debating whether to ask him if the magical solution would also cause the person who drank it to say or do things that seemed out of character. But asking might bring up questions I wasn't prepared to answer so I kept quiet.

When he finished, he sighed and gave me a once over. "How's your head?"

I touched the bump, surprised he noticed it. The wound was already healing. "How did you know I hit my head?"

"Kade told me when he brought in Peter's body," Heathcliff said.

I scanned the room. Peter's body was lying on another empty gurney, which meant Kade had been here, but he wasn't around now. "Where did he go?"

Heathcliff shrugged. "He did his angel thing and vanished," he said, studying my reaction to his words. Apparently he'd know what Kade was too. "I know I'm just the doctor," he continued, "but if you want my opinion, you and Wrythe are better suited for each other." He lifted a brow as though waiting for me to argue with him. "Not that you need to listen to me. It's just my opinion as a man of medicine… and magic occasionally."

That surprised me. I hadn't realized he knew Kade and I were together, but I should've guessed. The good doctor seemed to know much more about the compound's inner workings than I did. "Why? Because Wrythe and I are both Dark Moths?"

Heathcliff took the cloth from me and started cleaning another of the king's wounds, scrubbing a whole lot more roughly than I would've. "That's part of it, but also, you and Wrythe have similar backgrounds. The two of you have a lot in common," he said.

True, but didn't all Moths have a similar back story? Dad was a demon. Mom died after childbirth. Child spends time in the system until a Dark Moth finds them and brings them to the compound. What more was there? And sure, Kade was an angel. We were completely different, but none of that mattered. Kade was… everything to me. Not that it mattered. According to the Devil we couldn't be together—unless Kade wanted to give up everything. "I guess," I agreed, deciding not to share my thoughts with the Doc. He was entitled to his opinion, whether I agreed or not.

Heathcliff shrugged. “I mean, what do I know? I’ve never been in a relationship that lasted longer than a few months. The humans I’ve dated hate the hours I keep and don’t like it that I can’t share this part of my life with them, and the supernaturals I date end up disliking how human I am.” He finished cleaning Wrythe’s wounds and began sewing up another of the many cuts peppered across Wrythe’s body.

I’d been about to ask Heathcliff if he was a supernatural of some kind, but then thought better of it. If he wanted me to know, he would tell me in his own time. “How did you get the job as doctor for the Dark Moths?”

Heathcliff paused, the needle suspended in midair. “Well, that, my dear, is a very long story, but suffice it to say, I didn’t find out about the job in the regular way. There was no resumé or interview process. It was kind of a trial by fire, if you catch my drift.” He finished sewing up the wound, snipped off the thread and then gave me a look. “Have a seat and let me see if you have a concussion.”

I did as Doc asked while he put me through a series of tests. “I can’t believe it, but you seem fine. I’ve noticed you heal faster than the other Dark Moths. Not sure if it’s your heritage, but that’s my hypothesis.” He went back over to Wrythe and prepared to sew up another gash.

“You’re probably right.” I tried to smile, but my parentage was never going to be a comfortable topic.

“When things calm down, I’d love to run some tests,” he said, getting to work on the next cut.

In that moment, I remembered all of the tortured demons on level D13. Did Heathcliff know what was going on down there? My first instinct was no way, but I didn’t really know him that well. “Sure,” I said lightly, standing. “I need to go find your dad as well as Kenmei. Do you know whether they’re still waiting for me in the parking garage?"

"As far as I know." He threaded the needle and went to work on another gash just below the first one on Wrythe's torso. I had to look away as thoughts of the torture Wrythe must've endured flooded my mind.

"All right. Thanks." I went to the door, opening it.

"Alice," Heathcliff said.

"Yes?"

"You did good. Saving Wrythe. I'm not sure what all is happening with your Society, but Wrythe is a good man."

I swallowed a sudden lump in my throat. "Thanks for saying so, Doc."

He grunted before returning to his work.

I left, heading through the compound. The hallways were surprisingly empty. As I went, I passed two groups of Dark Moths, but they were too involved in their own conversations to notice me, or, if they did, I was of no interest to them.

I needed to go back up into Wonderland and see about Professor Pops and Kenmei. Thankfully, I still had Peter's key as well as the demon orb, though I'd tucked the orb in my boot at some point. I could feel it jiggling around in the right one as I walked, which reminded me that when the Devil flung me, I'd dropped my knife and gun. At some point, I needed to go get those.

The elevator ride above ground seemed to go on forever, but it gave me time to think about Wrythe's kiss. What the hell was that about? I felt something for the man, no doubt about it. And when his lips touched mine, there'd been a wave of heat that rushed through my belly. But I loved Kade.

As uncomfortable as the conversation would be, I would have to explain that to Wrythe—the sooner the better. That led me to my next worry, which was Kade himself. Had he seen Wrythe kiss me? Was he upset that the king had told me loved me? If I'd seen such a thing, I would've been livid. In fact, just thinking about Kade kissing another woman sent a ruby glow racing along my skin. Once I spoke with Professor Pops and Kenmei, I would speak to Kade and make him understand that Wrythe's kiss meant nothing. But maybe it should. He said he loved me and while I struggled to believe the king, I also knew he and I could be together. In fact, we would make a great match. While my heritage made it so Kade and I couldn't be together.

Guilt punched me. I didn't know what to do, but I knew what I felt. I still loved Kade.

"Hurry up," I hissed at the elevator.

A memory of the lights and voices I'd seen and heard after the Devil threw me across the room came to mind. Sure, I'd hit my head pretty hard, but that didn't explain how real the lights and voices seemed. What where they? And what had they meant when they said I was the answer, the one they'd been waiting for. Who the hell were they?

My mind jumped from those questions to the trials. The Devil was right, I already knew which choice was the right one, but that didn't mean I was ready to make it. Nor did it mean I even could. Both Wrythe and Kade were important to me and I didn't want either one to die. But the Devil had said something interesting. As an angel, Kade was immortal. Did that mean Kade wouldn't die the way I understood it?

The possible answer worried me when I exited the elevator. The parking garage was lit by the occasional light, but it was obviously dark outside. I didn't know what time of night it was, and I didn't care. Succinctly, I moved up through the garage. "Professor Pops?" I called when I reached the top. "Kenmei?"

The night sky twinkled with stars and satellites, but I paid them no attention, searching between the cars for any sign of the vampires. It occurred to me they might have returned to Salem.

Before I had time to fret too much, Professor Pops stepped from behind a large black truck. “Alice,” he said, his voice filled with worry. “Thank goodness you’re safe.” His relieved smile was in stark contrast to the rest of his appearance as he still wore all of his weapons and had a gun in his hand. He quickly holstered it as Kenmei appeared beside him, radiating quiet menace. There was no way I wanted to meet either of these men in a dark alley as enemies.

“Yes, I’m fine.” I walked over to them.

“I am so sorry we weren’t able to assist you,” Professor Pops said, patting my shoulder when I reached him.

“It wasn’t your fault. There are wards surrounding the compound.” I felt bad they’d waited. I could’ve texted or called Professor Pops, telling them they were free to go.

“I should’ve known something like that would be protecting the compound,” he said, obviously irritated with the situation. “But it’s over and you’re safe. That’s what’s important.”

“I told you that would happen,” Kenmei said, his eyes shining in the minimal light.

“Yes, I suppose you did.” Each of Professor Pops’ words came out filled with sarcasm, his features contorted with annoyance. “Is Wrythe safe?” Professor Pops asked, his irritation fading to kindness as he returned his attention to me. He was frustrated, but still ready to help. Before I could respond, a ping came from the phone in his pocket. He took it out, scrutinizing it. Then frowned.

“Is everything okay?” I asked.

“Yes, fine,” Professor Pops said, but I sensed that wasn’t completely true. “Tell me all that happened.”

I explained about how I found Wrythe and Peter, forcing myself not to break down in sobs when I spoke about Peter’s death. Then I told them how the Devil killed all of the council members, except Wrythe, and that I still had to complete the second trial. “I’m sorry I wasted your time,” I finished lamely.

“Nonsense, Alice,” Kenmei said. “We just wished we could’ve done more, though I’m ready for a nap.”

I narrowed my eyes at the man who was also a dragon and a cat, curious about what else he could be. “Thank you,” I said and meant it.

Professor Pops shook his head at the man beside him. “Yes, we want to be of help in any way we can…” he said as his phone pinged again. Distracted, he glanced at it, then cleared his throat. “If there is anything else we can do, please just say the word.”

“Thank you,” I said, appreciating his continued willingness even after he’d been stuck in this parking garage for who knew how long.

“When I get back to the house, I’m going to do some more research on why you’re shining with silver-white light. I’ll also find out all I can about the demon orb, starting with who created it and what it’s supposed to do,” Professor Pops added.

I glanced at Kenmei. His eyes were closed as though he were sleeping where he stood. “Thanks, Professor Pops, but I already know who created the demon orb.”

“You do?” Kenmei asked, his eyes springing open.

“Of course. It was you,” I said, putting my hands on my hips. “Well dragon you anyway.” I didn’t know how it worked, if he remembered everything after he shifted.

The professor studied his strange friend. “Figures,” he said, flashing his fangs in irritation as he shook his head. “I should’ve known. Why didn’t you tell me?”

Kenmei smiled sheepishly. “Had you asked, I would have, Adam.”

Professor Pops clucked his tongue. “Well then, why don’t you tell us all about it now? And spare no details.” He leaned against the truck as though he had all night to visit.

Kenmei shrugged, clasping his hands behind his back and angling to face up toward Professor Pops. “There’s not a whole lot to tell. There were three orbs in the beginning. Each orb is a last-resort kind of magic and it gives the user what they need most, though normally it isn't exactly what they want. Two have been used, leaving just the one Alice possesses."

I thought of the woman who watched her demon sire die a thousand times and appreciated Kenmei's explanation. Had that woman still been alive, I had no doubt she would've agreed she hadn't wanted to witness the demon's death that many times. But I guessed it had to do with balance. For every good, there is an equal bad and all that crap. I still believed the Devil should die, but that made me think about why I would die if the Devil did and vice versa. If we were both evil, then that meant two wrongs. Surely, one of us would be fine being gone from this world.

"I see." Professor Pops tore his eyes from Kenmei and focused them on me. "It's as clear as mud what the demon orb does."

I made a face. "Pretty much," I said, grateful they couldn't know my thoughts.

Professor Pops' phone pinged for a third time, and he studied the screen, fighting to keep his expression serene, but it wasn't working. Someone else clearly needed his help.

"You guys should go," I said, tucking my hands in my pockets. "I really appreciate all you've done for me, but I don't think there's much more you can do." It saddened me to see Professor Pops go, but it was true and I needed to get back to Wrythe and speak with Kade.

"You sure?" Pops asked, but I sensed his relief too. He glanced at Kenmei, but the man kept silent.

"Definitely. Sorry I kept you waiting for so long." Without thinking, I ran over and gave Pops a hug. "I hope everything is okay?" I asked, indicating his phone.

"It will be," he admitted, but didn't go into detail as he hugged me back.

"Well, let me know if I can return the favor and help you out." The vampire smelled of peppermint and something smoky that I couldn't place.

“I will,” he said when I released him.

I debated whether to hug Kenmei, but his held out his arms. I smiled as I embraced him.

He chuckled, patting my back lightly. “Listen to your heart, Alice. All isn’t as it seems within you. Surely you’ve noticed the changes,” he said, quietly.

Had I? “I suppose,” I said and released him. Then studied the two men. It was apparent there was something going on that had nothing to do with the Devil or Demonland. Again, I acknowledged how sheltered my life was and cursed my own ignorance.

We stood there awkwardly a moment.

“Go on then,” Pops said to Kenmei.

“Fine,” Kenmei responded and walked over to a spot that was empty of vehicles.

While we waited, Professor Pops looked at me. “He’s the most infuriating dragon, but he means well,” he said.

“I get that,” I said and smiled.

After a quick glance around, Kenmei stopped and morphed into the enormous golden dragon known as Abernathy.

Professor Pops and I made our way over to the dragon as he shook his mane and blew out a puff of smoke.

“If you need me, I’m just a phone call away,” Professor Pops said and hefted himself up onto the dragon’s back.

Abernathy smiled, revealing all of his pointy white teeth before he turned and leaped into the sky.

I watched as the dragon climb, thinking I would never get used to his transformation. As though he knew I still watched, the dragon did several flips and loops until he was out of sight.

Rolling my shoulders, I walked back down the stairs until I reached the main floor and the elevator. “Kade?” I called, hoping he would hear me.

“Hello, Alice,” he said, appearing in front of me, his arms crossed. The angel was upset.

At first I couldn’t understand why. And then Wrythe’s kiss came to mind. Kade was more than upset, he was jealous. “You saw what Wrythe did?” I asked, glancing down at my shoes, tucking my hands in my pockets.

“And heard what he said too,” he admitted.

“You know I love you, right?” I asked, moving close and resting my hands on his arms.

“I do,” Kade said, his features softening as he placed his hands on my waist.

“You better.” I relaxed my head against his chest, enjoying the heady cinnamon scent of him.

His thumbs roamed along the skin between my shirt and my pants. My body came to life at his touch, and I sucked in a breath. “And I love you,” he said, kissing the top of my head.

I turned my faced up and his mouth was on mine.

A little moan escaped my throat and he pulled me tight against him, deepening the kiss.

My hands explored his arms and shoulders and I twined my fingers in his hair. When his tongue flicked into my mouth, electricity flooded through me, lighting every up every nerve with desire.

“Get a room,” someone shouted.

Kade pulled away, and I missed him instantly. The color of rage radiated along my skin as I searched for the jerk who’d separated me from the man I loved.

“Easy, Alice. It’s fine. We could go someplace a bit more private, like your room.” He wiggled his eyebrows playfully as he tugged on my ponytail. My head fell back, exposing my neck. He leaned down, kissing it lightly before moving those amazing kisses up to my jawline.

“Keep that up and we won’t make it,” I growled, desperate for him as I pressed the elevator button.

Once we were inside and the elevator doors closed, he pressed me against the wall, his lips on mine again. I clung to him, loving every touch, every brush of his fingers along my body, and the way his mouth moved over mine.

In that moment, nothing else mattered. There was only Kade and me. The world and all our problems fell away. He pressed into me, and that one movement lit a fire low in my belly.

Kade, I cried in my mind, hoping his name told him all that I needed and wanted from him.

His pressed my mouth open. I know, he replied, but I sensed his hesitation and knew why. If we made love, Kade would lose his angel essence. I pulled away. “What does that even mean?” I asked, gently biting his bottom lip in frustration.

“What?” he asked, kissing my cheeks and trailing more kisses down my neck to my collarbones.

“What is your angel essence anyway? I mean…” I want you. I kept switching from speaking out loud to talking to him with my mind. It was a useful talent to have, especially when we were kissing.

“I’m not sure,” he said between kisses. I hooked a leg on his hip as his lips found mine again.

Would you die? The thought was out before I could censor it.

The question immediately tamped down our passion. Kade stopped, searching my eyes.

“I love you, Kade. I can’t lose you. With all the crap going on in my life, I would die if I lost you,” I said, caressing his chest.

He brushed some hair off my face. “Alice Blackburn, you have my heart and my soul. We’ll figure this out. Somehow. Some way, we’ll be together in every way, always and forever,” he said, stroking my cheek.

The elevator doors pinged open.

OceanofPDF.com

"ALICE?" Wendy's voice brought us back to reality.

I cleared my throat, adjusting my clothes. "Hi." Behind her one of the hall lights sparked, briefly illuminating her face. Her features set in confusion, I wondered how much she knew. Before I could ask, the light fizzled and sparked again before its globe shattered, sending pieces raining to the floor. The empty light socket dangled from the wall like a fried menial demon.

"What are you doing here?" The confusion spread.

She must know something and I had a momentary fear she would try to kill me the way Georgia and Gilbert had, but a quick check of her hands told me she wasn't holding a weapon though she still had to powers.

"I'll meet you in your room," Kade said, kissing my cheek. "Nice to see you Wendy," he said, acknowledging her as he walked by.

"Uh, you too, I think," she returned.

I clasped my hands in front of me to keep them from shaking. My body still hummed and my lips were swollen. Kade, I thought, yearning for him.

I'll see you soon. Don't be gone too long, he responded in my mind, causing me to smile.

"What's going on?" Wendy asked when Kade was out of earshot. "Should he even be here?"

"He helped me save Wrythe," I said, trying to regain my composure and hoped that was an adequate answer.

She gave me an odd look. "Are you okay?"

That was a loaded question. "Sure. I mean, I guess." I couldn't decide whether to tell her what had happened with all the council members, including Peter, or not. The memories caused me to flinch.

“Really?” She took my arm, studying me cautiously.

“As okay as I can be,” I admitted, starting down the hall. I needed to speak with Wrythe.

She came with me. As we went, I noticed she no longer wore her trainee clothes but had on the black form-fitting uniform of a Dark Moth warrior. That brought me up short. “Hey, you’re official,” I said. Above her right breast was the Dark Moth insignia, a tribal moth in solid geometric patterns created with thick lines indicating wings, a body, and antennae. Hers had been sewn into the fabric with red thread, indicating her sire was a Wrath demon. Above the moth and to the left was a small silver button representing her rank as an officer cadet. In a year, she would be evaluated again, and her rank would change depending on how well she did. “Congratulations,” I added.

“Thanks.” Her countenance glinted with happiness, more so than I’d seen from her since before Eric died. “I’m sure you’ll receive yours soon.” A shadow passed over her face.

“What?”

“Well, it’s just that Lily said some things about you and about Wrythe. I didn’t want to believe them, but…”

“What did she say?” I tried to act natural and wound up crossing my arms.

“She said that you took Peter and Wrythe with the intent to take over the Society. That you were a traitor and should be killed on sight.” She swallowed, tucking her hands into her front pockets. “And then Gilbert and Georgia told me you killed Lily right in front of them. They said Lily turned to ash like a demon.” Wendy shook her head. “But I watched you battle Eric’s sire and you saved several of us from our demon sires, and if you hadn’t done that, I wouldn’t be a Dark Moth warrior. I’d be dead.” She took a breath, but I didn’t say anything. Just waited for her to continue. “I figured if you wanted to take over the Society, you wouldn’t go around saving us, but would do your best to destroy us, so you had to have a reason for what you did.

Sadly, most of those still in the compound believe what Lily said." She glanced around to verify we were still alone.

I appreciated her honesty and her loyalty. She was turning into quite the friend. "Thank you, Wendy," I said, feeling slightly awkward. Some of what she said was true. I did kill Lily and she did turn to ash, but I'd only defended myself. "I'm sure Wrythe will announce to the compound what exactly happened, but I'll tell you what I know."

She touched my arm. "I'm listening."

I told her about Lily taking Peter and Wrythe and all that had happened between the other council members and the Devil. She listened intently, shocked. When I finished, she took a step back. "So Peter is dead?"

"Yes." I nodded solemnly, swallowing down the hurt, sadness, and pain building within. "He was dead when I got there. They'd already killed him." I shook my head, feeling like I might cry. "I didn't save him."

Wendy hugged me. "It sounds like you did the best you could."

I clung to her. I hadn't realized how much I needed her support until I had it. "I appreciate you saying that, Wendy, but it still doesn't change the fact that he's gone and the council killed him for supporting me."

She stood back. "Perhaps it was because of you, but I think it had more to do with Wrythe. Peter supported him fully, and from what you've told me, the council wanted Lily to rule. You couldn't have known what they were up to. I mean, it wasn't that long ago we were just trainees."

She was right, and I knew it, but my heart wouldn't allow me to feel any peace. "Thanks," I said again. It sounded lame, but I couldn't bring myself to agree with her.

"What do you need me to do? I've been assigned to work under Grayson, but he was wounded during a demon takedown." She gritted her teeth. “I have some time, if you need me.”

My heart swelled with gratitude. “I may take you up on that, but right now, I need to talk to Wrythe and see what he intends to do next. When I know more, I’ll tell you, if that’s okay.”

“Sounds like a plan.” She gave me another quick hug and I tried not to act surprised by the changes. “Find me when you’re done. I’m leading the new trainees in weapons training today, so I’ll either be in the training room or the cafeteria.”

“Will do. See ya.” I went in the direction of Heathcliff’s office while Wendy headed to the training room.

“What time is it?” I called after her, hoping she knew.

She checked her watch. That was new and I guessed it was part of her official Dark Moth warrior gear. “Nine thirty in the evening.”

“Got it. Thanks.” I headed in the direction of Heathcliff’s office. When I arrived, I hesitated as an image of a floundering fish came to mind. That was how I felt. Shaking the thought, I knocked once before opening the door. Inside, Heathcliff was attending to a young trainee who leaned over a puke bucket, her skin pallid.

“If you’re here for Wrythe, you’re in the wrong place. That blasted man left, against my express orders to stay put, saying he had a lot of work to do,” Heathcliff said when he saw me.

“Thanks.” I backed out of his office, my hand still on the doorknob.

Heathcliff called after me, “Try the cafeteria. He mentioned he was hungry.”

“Got it.” I headed that direction after closing Doc’s door. No one wanted to hear someone puke if they didn’t have to. The sound wasn’t pleasant.

Before I reached the cafeteria, I heard the low roar of Moths chatting within. It didn’t matter the time or that the Society was in chaos, we always needed to eat. No one but Wrythe, Heathcliff, and I really knew what was going on anyway. A quick perusal verified he wasn't among the masses. Without making eye contact, I left and rushed to Wrythe's office.

Before knocking on his door, I paused, listening for voices. The last time I'd been here, the council members and Wrythe had been discussing whether or not I should die. Now there was only silence. I rapped once on the door.

"Come in," Wrythe said.

Semi surprised he was there, I entered, knowing the conversation would be weird to say the least, but probably awkward. He'd kissed me and said he loved me. I still couldn't believe that was the truth and hoped it was part of the magical elixir Heathcliff gave him.

It'd been a while since I'd been in his office and things were slightly changed. I wondered randomly who'd redecorated and how much such things cost the Society. He sat at a large, sleek black desk. Behind him were ebony bookshelves that shone in the light from the masculine chandelier. The crystals from the light gave the room an almost magical glow. The ceilings were high, probably twelve or more feet. In here, it would be hard to guess we were so far underground.

"Alice," he said, standing, his hands outstretched. He wore a white shirt, which set off his naturally tanned body, and his black hair was up in a man bun, causing his features to stand out. I took his hands and smiled, trying to see any sign that he loved me on his demeanor. There wasn't any, but at least he looked better.

"Let's sit," he said, leading me over to a sitting area complete with overstuffed white chairs and a fireplace with shiny black tile trailing from the floor all the way to the ceiling. "Do you want some tea?" he asked, pouring himself a cup from a white teapot. It seemed so small and fragile in his large hands.

"Sure," I said, suddenly very thirsty.

He poured me a cup and handed it over.

I took a sip, noting it was hot and kind of bitter. Not my favorite.

"I'm so glad you're here," he said watching me.

Placing the cup on the table, I caught his gaze and held it. He seemed too calm and like he hadn't almost died. "How are you feeling?" I asked, placing my hands in my lap.

"Fine. Fine," he said, waving the question away. "We have a lot to do and I need your help."

"Of course, sire. Whatever you need." Instinctively, I leaved forward. Maybe he didn't even remember kissing me or saying those words. I hoped that was the case. Then we wouldn't need to have the difficult conversation.

My use of the word sire caused him to wince. "After all we've been through together, please call me Wrythe. I won't accept anything else," he added when he saw me hesitate.

I nodded, taking another sip of my tea. The bitter was better than holding his gaze.

"Good. Now, first off, thank you for saving me." He smiled, his straight white teeth lighting up his face.

"Si-Wrythe, it was my pleasure. Of course. It was the right thing to do." I didn't want him to gush. It was my fault he'd been in that position in the first place and while I knew the council would've tried to overthrow him eventually, I couldn't help but wonder if Wrythe might've changed their minds or stopped them before it led to Peter's death.

He set his tea cup on the black coffee table and leaned back. "As you know, the council is gone." He paused. "Peter is gone. We need to give him a proper funeral. After that, I must select new council members. I'd like your help in the selection process. Most importantly, I'd like you to be on my new council."

I was shocked. "But sire—I mean Wrythe—wouldn't you prefer someone older and more experienced?" I was barely past my eighteenth birthday. There were many other Dark Moths more qualified and much more skilled.

"If ever there was a person capable of leading the Dark Moth Society, it's you. As the current king, I'll reign until such time as I see fit to bestow the Society on you." He spoke with finality, but that couldn't be.

"Sire," I began and paused, knowing he wanted me to call him Wrythe. "I don't want to rule Demonland. You are the king and will be for a long, long time."

Wrythe patted my knee. "And that's exactly why you're the Moth who should rule when I'm gone. You wouldn't be leading for power or glory, but because you wanted good for all Moths. Besides," he paused, his gray eyes piercing mine. "There is no one I trust more than you, Alice Blackburn."

That meant a lot coming from him, but I still didn't think it was a good idea. The question was how to convince him. "I can't be on your council, Wrythe. I'm still just a trainee."

He smiled and stood. "I've already thought of that," he said, and went to his desk, removing a package from the bottom drawer and bringing it over. It was wrapped in brown twine. "Here. Open it," he said, holding it out for me.

"What is it?" I asked, pulling at the bow.

"You'll see."

I removed the tape and carefully unfolded the paper. Inside was a Dark Moth uniform, but what caused my intake of breath was the Moth insignia. I'd wondered what color they would give me, if they ever made me a warrior. If the thread was black, it would be difficult to see. As I'd half expected, the insignia had been sewn in with black thread, but it also had all seven of the colors of the seven deadly sins woven within. "How?" I asked, lifting it from the paper to study it more closely.

"Magic," Wrythe said, sitting beside me. "Heathcliff asked what I would do for your uniform and suggested I speak with the dragon Abernathy. He gave me the spell and Heathcliff worked it over with the thread. Isn't it incredible?"

“Yes,” I breathed, a bubbly excitement and peace overflowing my heart. “Wrythe, I can’t believe you went to all the trouble.”

He scooted closer. “Alice.” His fingers caressed my cheek. “You’re the most incredible woman I’ve ever met. And if you would be so inclined—”

I couldn’t let him finish. “I love Kade,” I blurted, standing and walking across the room. I needed space because even though I knew I loved Kade, I had feelings for Wrythe. They were deep and strange and growing stronger by the second.

Wrythe clamped his mouth shut, glancing down a moment. “I understand,” he said, all business. “And I appreciate your honesty.” His features transformed into those of a king. “That doesn’t change the fact that I need you on my council. Your inauguration into the Dark Moth Society will be at midnight.”

“What about Peter?” I was stunned. My fingers crushed my warrior uniform as I thought about what would happen tonight.

“I’m announcing an assembly in just a few minutes. Once everyone is gathered, I intend to lay out the treachery within the council as well as share all you did to assist me. I will tell them of Peter’s death and inform everyone that his funeral will be held tomorrow.”

“So soon,” I said, coming back over to him. I could sense his deep sorrow at the loss of Peter and refused to allow him to suffer alone.

“Heathcliff said he would help his wife, Sarah prepare Peter’s body.”

I didn’t know Peter had a wife. Then internally I rolled my eyes. Of course not. It wasn’t my place to know. That aside, I couldn’t believe my inauguration would be tonight and my heart raced. “What do I need to do to prepare?”

He smiled, a sad smile that didn’t reach his eyes. “You might want to rest and get ready for all that’s happening tonight. You’ll be by my side during the assembly and then your inauguration.” He rubbed the back of his neck and I sensed the weight of all he needed to do hanging heavily around him. “And then tomorrow after the funeral, there will be a celebration.”

“Will we even feel like celebrating?” I didn’t want to disrespect my former teacher in any way.

“It was Peter’s wish that we have a party after his funeral. It will be for him that we celebrate,” Wrythe said shooing me to the door. “Now go. I have much to do.”

“Okay then.” I waited while Wrythe opened the door and went through, but before I left, I turned back. “Wrythe,” I began, not knowing what to say, but wanting to say something.

“Can you meet me in my quarters later?” His eyes were soft.

I swallowed nervously. “All right.” I glanced nervously down at my hands and my uniform. “And thank you again for this,” I said, holding it up. “It’s the most thoughtful thing anyone has ever done for me.”

“Oh?” He raised his eyebrows and I knew he was comparing himself to Kade.

I wouldn’t go into details, but it was true. “I mean it. Thank you.” I left, walking back to my room, lost in thought. It would be so much easier if I could feel for Wrythe the way I felt for Kade. We were both Dark Moths, half demon and half human. Kade was an angel, in every way different than me. Wrythe and I were created from sin while Kade was virtue—at least according to the lore.

That Kade and I were so attracted to each other made no sense, unless the saying opposites attract was literal as well as physical. We were amazing together and I wouldn’t give him up. There was no comparison between the soft, sweet affection I felt for Wrythe versus the passionate, all-consuming need I had for Kade. It was like having a choice between buttery, fresh-baked bread and chocolate cake layered with chocolate mousse topped with creamy chocolate frosting. Sure, the bread was good. Maybe even better for me, but the cake was absolute decadence.

The closer I came to my room, the faster my pulse raced. Kade waited for me there. And that meant more time in his arms. But as soon as I opened my door, I knew he wasn't inside. Atop my bed was a package similar to the one Wrythe had given me, and I guessed inside were more uniforms since that's what I would be wearing from now on. I hoped they fit. Before I opened the wrapping, I picked up the envelope, thinking it was from our seamstress and it would give me details and instructions. Instead it was a note from Kade.

Dearest Alice,

I wanted to tell you in person, and waited as long as I could, but my superiors were very insistent. I've been summoned back and when they require my presence, I don't have a choice. In case you aren't one hundred percent certain of me, I wanted you to know I love you and though I've been called back, I can't say I've been called home because you are now my home. I'll return as soon as I am able. You, Alice, are the beat of my heart and the pulse in my veins. I know now my existence is only for you.

Always and forever.

Kade

I read his note several times, forcing myself not to get upset, choosing instead to admire the swirls and slant of the hand-written note. I could feel Kade's love for me in every letter, each period and comma. He hadn't just vanished the way he'd done before but had taken the time to write me and let me know what happened. That was growth on his part and I appreciated it. Tucking the letter under my pillow, I got my stuff together for a shower. As I turned on the water, Wrythe's voice over the intercom made the announcement about the assembly. I needed to hurry.

After I showered, I studied my new uniform a moment. I wanted to wear it, but couldn't until my inauguration. Going to my closet, I selected my black camo pants and a black long sleeve shirt. I was hungry but didn't have time. I debated whether to run to the cafeteria for a sandwich when there was a knock on the door.

When I opened it, there was a tray of what smelled like food on the floor. It was covered and hot. I picked it up and looked both ways to thank the one who'd brought it, but no one was around. My mouth watered as I took it to my bed. Removing the lid, I picked up my fork. Cook had prepared a pork chop covered in pecan and apple chutney. Next to it was a baked potato with a side of green beans. There was also a roll, some butter, and a bowl of fruit along with two glasses of water.

While I ate I thought about what Wrythe had said. He wanted me on his council. Was that wise or would it cause problems between Kade and me? By the time I finished eating, I decided to accept Wrythe's invitation to be on the council and that the feelings Kade and I had for each other were strong enough to survive anything. Besides, I told myself, Wrythe needed me. I couldn't let him down.

During all of my internal debating and decision-making, I continued to avoid the reality of the second trial, but it lurked in the back of my mind. I couldn't accept that either of them would ever be gone.

OceanofPDF.com

AT THE ASSEMBLY, I stood beside Wrythe as he explained all that happened and would be happening over the next few days. It didn't escape my notice that he intended to have the council reorganized in time for me to make my choice for the second trial. And that's when I realized he intended for me to run the Society, not in the years to come, but now. He expected me to choose Kade over him and was taking the necessary steps to ensure the Society survived his death. At that thought, my heart ached. He'd kissed me and told me he loved me knowing full well I loved someone else.

That revelation shook me to my core. Wrythe really did trust me and he was counting on me. When he finished speaking, he opened up the floor for questions.

Georgia, who I noticed wore her Dark Moth uniform with the gold Moth insignia shining bright and new above her right breast, spoke first. "Why should we trust you?" Her question bordered on insubordination and I held my breath wondering if Wrythe would stand for such insolence.

"A fair question, Georgia. You should trust me because I've never given you a reason not to," he said. Then pointed to Grayson, who had his hand raised.

"How will the new council member selection be run?" he asked.

"I have a list of Dark Moths who have served the Society well for many years," Wrythe said, his focus on Grayson. "But," he began, gazing out at all of his subjects, "if anyone would like to volunteer to be on the council, they may submit their name and I will honestly consider them." He cleared his throat. "I may as well tell you that there will be eight members instead of seven as there have been in the past. Alice Blackburn will serve as the eighth member."

That sent the crowd into an uproar. Murmurs and shouts arose like a giant wave in a tumultuous storm. Wrythe waited several minutes before raising his hand for silence.

“Why would you let that abomination on the council? She isn’t one of us. Not really.”

I didn’t see who made the comment, but Wrythe did.

“I appreciate your comment, Stelvern, but I must respectfully disagree,” Wrythe said evenly, and I noticed his hands clenching and unclenching at his sides. It spoke volumes to his self-control that he wasn’t allowing his wrath to rule him right now. “You say she isn’t one of us and I see by the looks on several faces that many agree, but the truth is, Alice Blackburn the culmination of us all. If any one person could ever begin to understand each and every one of her subjects, it would be her. She possesses all seven of the deadly sins within her and has learned how to control them better than any of us could.” He gave me a sideways glance, a grim smile splayed across his mouth.

I blinked back tears, touched by his support. He believed every word he was saying and I worked to believe them as well.

Warrant spoke up next. “If that’s true, then shouldn’t she be locked away? It’s hard enough to handle the power of one demon. What must it be like to try to control all seven?”

“Why would we lock up our best hope for the future,” Wrythe responded. “That she managed all seven so well is a testament to the kind of person she is—the kind of person I want to be. For now, believe me when I say, she possesses more control than most of us ever could.”

“And what of her Trials? How can you let her live knowing she must choose you or that boy?” Stelvern asked, his body language bolder than before.

Wrythe growled, and I sensed his control waning. “She lives, Stelvern because,” he paused and took in each person within the compound. “Hear this and hear it well. If Alice isn’t allowed to choose, then we all die. Not just me and not just her, but every single one of us." He spoke the last several words slowly, allowing them to sink in. Then he straightened. "It's that simple."

There was a collective gasp from the crowd. I was surprised Wrythe shared the information, but it was fact. The Devil had made it clear. Either I chose Wrythe or Kade, or all Moths would die.

"Is this true?" someone from the crowd demanded.

"I would not say it if it weren't. I can promise you that." Wrythe clamped his jaws together, the muscles in his face flexing and contracting.

"But that can't be," another said.

"I was there when the Devil spoke the words. This situation is as real as you and I, my friend." Wrythe rolled his shoulders, trying to remain calm.

Kade suddenly appeared on the very back row and despite all the people in the oversized room, I spotted him immediately. A distinct light radiated off him. It was faint, so faint I doubted anyone else could see it, but I could, and he took my breath away.

You're beautiful, I said into his mind, my breath catching in my throat. He leaned against the doorframe and light from the hallway emanated all around him.

Thanks, he returned, studying me intently.

The question and answer session continued, but I was no longer listening. My every vein and sinew were tuned to Kade. He was all I could see, hear, and think about. Like an overtaught violin, if I tried to do anything but concentrate on Kade, I might burst or break.

"Alice?" Wrythe asked.

I jumped. "Yes, sire," I said, clearing my throat.

He gave me a quizzical look. "Would you like to say a few words?"

Oh no, no, no. I really didn't want to address the Dark Moths, most of whom didn't like me or pretended I didn't exist. "Sure," I lied, coming to the pulpit.

Wrythe whispered in my ear. “You can do this. Keep it short and sweet.”

I nodded, swallowing down the sudden fear that had blocked my throat. “I just want you all to know,” I began, the last word cracking. Everyone laughed, and I decided to give into my nerves and go with it. “Obviously this is a new adventure for me,” I said, giving them a wry smile. “But I fully support King Wrythe. My greatest desire is to ensure each and every one of you have a safe and long life, and I pledge to do everything in my power to make that happen.” I placed a hand over my heart and bowed slightly, my forehead bonking into the microphone.

Everyone laughed again.

I was an idiot.

“Al-ice,” someone chanted my name slowly.

“Ali-ice,” another joined in.

Wendy, who stood in the front, lifted one fisted hand in the air, and smiled. “Al-ice. Al-ice.”

Pretty soon the whole room was chanting my name. It was surreal, and I was sure my face had turned the color of Cook’s cherry tartlets.

“Thank you,” I said, when they finished before moving off to the side, desperate to disappear.

“That was perfect,” Wrythe whispered. Into the microphone he said, “We’ll meet back here at midnight for the inauguration.” He stepped away from the mic.

The room erupted as people spoke to each other.

I decided I couldn’t face the crowds another moment and turned my back to them. “If you no longer need me,” I said to Wrythe, “I’m going to go to my room for a few minutes.” I thought of Kade.

“Can you spare an hour, so we can go over those I’m considering for the council? The sooner we choose, the better.”

He was right, and I fought back my disappointment. “Of course,” I said, glancing back to look for Kade, but he was gone. Dejected, I followed Wrythe out of the assembly hall and into his office. I was grateful he hadn’t taken me back to his rooms. I didn’t know why, but those four walls oozed passion and desire. One couldn’t help but think about all Wrythe had done on his oversized four-poster bed. I forced those thoughts away.

Are you coming to your room? Kade asked in my mind. I’m waiting.

Not yet. Wrythe wants to go over possible council members.

Kade didn’t respond immediately and I got the feeling my angel was sulking. We need to talk, he finally said.

I’ll be there as soon as I can, I responded, not liking the tone of his voice in my head. Is everything okay?

I have new orders, he replied simply.

My stomach did flip-flops. What are they?

I’ll tell you when you get to your room.

All right. Kade’s superiors had already told him not to see me any longer. Now what did they want? I couldn’t imagine.

“After you,” Wrythe said, opening the door to his office.

I forced myself through the entrance and went over to the chair across from his desk.

“That seems too formal,” Wrythe said. “Let’s sit on the couch.” He sailed past his desk, opening a drawer and retrieving a bulky manila file.

I followed him over and was about to sit when someone knocked on the door.

“Mind if I come in?” Grayson asked, poking his head through.

Wrythe stood, his eyes twinkling with amusement. “Grayson, I thought I might see you,” he said, taking the Dark Moth’s hand in his and shaking vigorously.

“Well, sire, I wanted to make sure you knew I was interested in being on the council. My qualifications are lengthy, as you know."

"Yes, indeed," Wrythe responded. "I know what you're capable of, Grayson, and you're already in contention."

A wave of relieved pleasure crossed his face. "Good. Thank you, sire." His eyes roamed over me in a slick, seductive way. "Alice. Anytime you want a training lesson, come to my room. I'd be glad to work you over."

"All right, Grayson, that'll be all." Wrythe held the door open, indicating the silver-tongued warrior should pound pavement.

"Right." He glanced at me and winked. "I mean it. Anytime."

"Thanks," I responded, forcing myself not to blush at his innuendo. The man was a walking poster for sex. Tall. Dark. Rippling muscles. Like someone plucked the perfect man right out of the sky and allowed him to dwell in our presence.

After the door closed, Wrythe went back over to the couch and pulled out Grayson's file. "What do we think of him?" the king growled softly.

I took a deep breath to clear my thoughts.

Wrythe heard me and looked up. "You doing okay?"

"Yeah, I'm fine. This is just a lot," I said. "But I'm sure it's worse for you. How are you healing?" I'd almost forgotten he'd been near death not that many hours ago.

"Better. Fine," he admitted. "I have to be," he said. "There's a lot to accomplish in a very short time."

"Wrythe," I started, but couldn't finish. What would I say? Wrythe, I won't choose you. Or, Wrythe, I'm sorry I'm choosing you. Those thoughts made me physically ill. How could I do that to the Dark Moths? At the same time, how could I live with myself if I sentenced Kade to death instead?

Wrythe seemed to feel my inner turmoil and patted my shoulder. "Tell me your thoughts on Grayson."

I sat back, lacing my fingers together. Glad for something else to worry about. “He’s a great fighter.”

“Agreed.” Wrythe leaned back in his chair as well.

“I’ve only ever heard him say good things about you,” I went on.

“Me too. He’s been loyal for nearly a century.”

Whoa. That was a long time to remain alive, especially for a Moth. “Then I say he’s definitely in the running as the Gluttony council member.”

“So do I.” Wrythe closed the file and set it on the coffee table before moving on to the next.

For the next hour or so, we went over dozens of possibilities. At one point, someone brought us food. We ate and talked, going over the candidates. I voiced my opinions openly and honestly. Wrythe took my thoughts into consideration. When it was time to get ready for the inauguration, Wrythe, shut the files and cleared his throat. “I’d say we did some good work, Alice.” He stacked the pile of rejected contenders and placed them in a drawer. Those he was interviewing went into his top desk drawer which he locked.

He stood, and I followed. “I agree. There are several great choices.” Not that my opinion really mattered. As he told the council members when he made them promise not to kill me, his word overruled all others in the end.

“The first interview will be tomorrow after Peter’s funeral. I’d appreciate it if you were there.”

“Are you sure, sire?” I didn’t feel prepared for such a task.

He came forward, his eyes raking over me before landing on my lips. “Definitely,” he said. I thought he might try to kiss me again, but he didn’t. He went to the door instead. “I’ll see you at the inauguration.”

“I’ll be there,” I said, relieved, a happy smile filling my face.

As I walked to my room, thoughts of possible council members flew from my mind and were replaced by images of Kade's mouth on mine. By the time I opened my door, my knees were weak.

He was asleep on my bed, lying on top of the covers, hands clasped together on his stomach and booted feet hanging off the edge. His long, sandy hair was splayed out and his face was soft. My angel was stunning!

"Kade," I whispered, going over to the bed and sitting gently beside him.

He opened his eyes and smiled, causing my heart to flutter with need. "Hi," he said, taking my hand.

I hadn't realized how tired I was until I felt his warm energy silt away my tension. "Hi yourself."

"Did you accomplish all you set out to with Wrythe?" He leaned up on his elbows.

I laughed at his turn of phrase. "Yes, we have some good possibilities. Wrythe and I will be interviewing them tomorrow." While I spoke, I straddled him.

Kade's eyes widened.

I leaned down so my face was directly over his. "What do you want to do now?" I asked.

His pupils dilated. "You're too delicious," he said, placing his hands on my hips.

I kissed him then. Soft and slow, loving the way my body stirred against him.

He groaned, digging his fingers into my hips.

I pushed open his mouth, feeling bold as I moved aside his tee shirt, stroking his chest and abs hungrily. He sat up, dragging his shirt over his head. I did the same with mine. He studied me a moment.

"So beautiful," he said, lying back on the bed, taking me with him.

Our kisses turned desperate, hungry, and as with every time before, I felt one with him.

How can this be wrong? I hadn't realized I'd thought it so loud until Kade responded.

It isn't. At least not completely.

That stopped me. He'd taken my hair from its tie, letting it fall around our faces like a curtain. "How do you know?" My gaze strayed from his eyes down his nose to his luscious lips. I licked mine, desire raging through me.

"There's something I should tell you," he said.

I sat up, trying to focus on what he said instead of what I wanted. "Okay. Spill." I climbed off him, my heart aching at his absence. It was almost time for me to leave again anyway.

His body told me he felt the same way I did, but he continued, "I know why you emanate silver-white light sometimes." Awe danced across his face.

"Tell me." I started to shake, afraid of what he would say, but desperate to know the truth. In one motion, I tugged on my shirt.

"It's because of your mother," he said, rolling off the bed and pulling his shirt on as well.

I went to my mirror and brushed through my hair before twisting it up into a bun, securing it with the tie. I waited a moment, thinking he would say more, but he didn't. My legs shook so hard I had to sit. "What do you know about my mother?" Spots danced in front of my eyes. "Is she still alive?"

"After the Devil seduced and impregnated her, she should've died. Some say she is dead, but I think she might not be," he said. "I don't know where she is though." He shook his head.

My mouth fell open, but I clamped it shut. I couldn't have heard right. "I'm confused. My mother might not be dead?" That went against everything the demons did as part of their game.

"I don't know," he admitted. "The rules are sketchy at best, especially given who and what she is."

“What is she?” I asked, already knowing what he would say, but unable to believe it.

“Your mother is an angel,” he said in a matter-a-fact manner. He crossed his arms, his features shifting faster than I could keep up. “And not just any angel either. She was an archangel of death, widely known, and greatly revered for her kindness and dedication to the human souls who died under her watch. Your mom was a human who became something vicious before becoming an angel.” He shook his head and it was apparent he was dealing with his own issues regarding my mother. “How exactly she became one is beyond me, but she is an angel.” He paused. “And more.”

Most of what he said didn’t filter. All I could focus on was that my mom was an angel. “Does that mean I’m an angel?”

“Half angel. Yes,” he nodded grimly.

“And there are different… levels of angels?” My mind kept repeating the phrase I’m an angel over and over again. All thoughts of Wrythe, the inauguration, the second Trial, and joining the Society council vanished.

“Of course. Remember balance? There are menial, tracker, and royal demons, right?”

“I get it,” I said, unable to say more. It felt like I was drowning. My arms crossed around myself, I paced, trying to hold myself together.

“It works the same with angels. There are lower, mid, and upper level angels, too. And your mom, as an archangel of death, was an upper level angel.”

By now, the shaking had consumed my entire body. Even my teeth were chattering. I didn’t want to believe what Kade said, but I felt the truth deep in my bones. I thought it explained a few things too—like the light that sprang off me sometimes and the strange power I’d possessed when I shoved Kade away from me in Pasty’s basement. “But that’s impossible. Why would an angel allow the Devil…?” I couldn’t even finish my sentence. “Surely she knew better?” I’d read plenty of books about the girl falling for the bad boy, but an angel falling for the Devil? Seemed beyond crazy.

"I don't know the whole story, Alice," he said slowly. "Supposedly, a long time ago she was a human who was forced to become something awful. The chayot found her and she was changed again. But the why behind her and the Devil having sex is beyond me. That's something you'll have to ask her, if you get the chance."

I thought my heart would pound out of my chest. "How do I find her? Where is she?" I'm a freaking half-angel... and half-demon. But not just half of any demon. I shuddered as my thoughts turned dark. No wonder the lights called me an abomination.

It was the truth.

"I asked around after they gave me my new assignment and it seems that when an angel who's previously been a human is stripped of their essence, they are sent back to Earth. Now whether she has memories of her life before, I don't know, but my guess is she doesn't, which would explain why she hasn't come looking for you." He ran a hand through his hair. "Which brings me to my next assignment." Kade looked away.

"What is it?" Last I heard, his bosses no longer wanted him around me.

"They've decided you truly are the one the prophecy is about and want you to return with me to the realm of angels." He sat back down on the bed.

I snorted, leaning back on my heels. "You don't buy into that prophecy stuff, do you?" It seemed ridiculous. A prophecy was nothing more than a glorified prediction. No one could know what another person would choose. It was impossible. I went to my chest of drawers and flipped the pages of the single book resting atop it.

"Actually, I do. The prophecy was something we learned about almost as soon as we started angel school." He rested his elbows on his thighs. "My superiors want you to come with me now."

My heart beat so fast I thought it would pound out of my chest. I was having a moment—as though I was dreaming I was awake when I was really dreaming and, in this dream, Kade was telling me I was an angel and not just any angel, but a special angel with a super-powerful mom, and it was weird and surreal, and I didn't like it. Not at all. "Look, you've just dropped a bombshell on me. I need time to process and I have to be here for Peter's funeral tomorrow." I shook my head. "I'm struggling to believe any of this, including some nonsense about a prophecy." Another of the strange talking lights had said something about a prophecy, hadn't it? But I couldn't deal with that. I could barely deal with the fact that I was an angel. "I can't," I said, trying to regain some calm. The shaking had subsided, but only just a little. "Wrythe and Demonland need me here."

He studied me intently. "But Alice, the realm of angels is more your home than this place."

"Is the realm Heaven?" I asked, feeling frustrated and scared and more discombobulated than I believed possible.

"Actually, no."

"Wait, there's no heaven?" I dropped the book and faced him. That surprised me and I came to sit beside him.

"There's a heaven, yes, and some angels reside there, but most dwell in the angel realm." Frustration was evident in his features as well as the way he crinkled his brow.

"You're breaking my brain right now." I went back to my corner, the one with the spider in it, and found her sitting in her web like she was listening to every word. She'd spun an egg sac. Soon, hundreds of baby spiders would be born. I studied it, pondering the beauty of life continuing and appreciating the distraction.

"I'm sure, and I'm sorry to dump this all on you at once." He came toward me, but I held up my hand. "It's urgent," he added.

I took a deep breath and walked past him and over to my closet. "I'm not going. At least, not right now. After the funeral, I need to help Wrythe. I'm the only person he can trust right now, and he needs me. With the end of the second trial coming up in a few days, he needs to get everything in order before…" I let the rest of the sentence die. I'd almost said before I chose him to die, and that made me feel like I would throw up. "Now doesn't work. You'll have to tell your superiors I appreciate their request, but I have to respectfully decline." I went to the door and yanked it open, indicating he should leave with the wave of my hand. Obviously he could just pop in and out, but this was the only way I knew how to tell him to go.

Kade shook his head. "Saying no isn't an option, Alice. If they want to see you, they'll make it happen one way or another," he said, standing and tucking his hands in his pockets.

"Is that a threat?" I asked, a hint of red glittering along my skin.

"Alice." He said my name quietly.

"Please, I need some time to think." And I needed to get ready for the inauguration.

"How long?" he asked, his voice so soft I barely heard him.

"I don't know." I crossed my arms and stared down at my feet, unable to meet his gaze.

After several long seconds, I looked up and he was gone. I sighed heavily, the ache for him pressing against my chest like a weight. I thought about calling him back and covering his face in kisses, but an image of Wrythe in his office telling me I was the only person he could trust came to mind. I couldn't leave him alone. I just couldn't.

OceanofPDF.com

THE INAUGURATION CEREMONY went by quickly. Not many people came, which was fine with me. My head pounded with all Kade told me. I'm half angel. I kept seesawing between thinking Kade was joking for some reason and then thinking I must be insane.

During the ceremony, Wrythe got up and said a few words. The audience clapped and that was it. I was officially a Dark Moth, though I didn't feel like one. I felt like a fraud.

When it was over and Wrythe and I had shaken hands with some of my teachers and trainers, including Grayson, Wrythe took me aside. "Are you all right?" Concern shone on his face.

"Yeah, I'm fine. Sorry. Today's just been a lot," I admitted.

"I get that." But he could tell there was more.

"Sire, we need to go over the program for Peter's funeral," Wendy said, coming over to us.

"Okay, sure." He smiled at her. "She's a real go-getter, this one," he said, pointing at Wendy.

"She is pretty amazing," I agreed, smiling at my friend.

"Thanks, Alice," she said, hugging me.

I was really starting to like this new Wendy. "It's the truth."

"I guess I'll see you tomorrow." It looked like he tried to say more with his eyes, but I wasn't sure what. With a wave, he followed after Wendy.

"See ya," I said, and suddenly felt very alone. I wandered around aimlessly for a while until I remembered I wanted to retrieve my knife and gun. In the elevator, I debated what I was doing. Then decided to stop at D13. When the metal doors opened, I braced myself for what I knew was to come and stepped into the room on the far left which had held the upper level demons. But the room was empty, pristine, like nothing had ever been in there. It was the same for the other two rooms as well.

I got back on the elevator and considered what I could do now that all evidence of the torture chambers were gone. Even if Wrythe believed me, there was no proof, which meant there was no way to reveal who'd done such horrible things to all of the demons. When I reached the bottom floor, I stepped out carefully. It was so quiet, my breathing echoed and bounced off the walls. I went to the stall where I dropped my weapons. They were still there. Relieved, I collected them, tucking the knife in my boot and the gun at my back. I turned to leave but couldn't make myself. Gingerly I sat on the dirt-covered ground, leaning my back against the wall. Closing my eyes, I forced myself to think about all that Kade told me.

My mom was an angel. And not just any angel, my mom was an upper level angel of death. I tried to think about what would've made her choose to have sex with the Devil and came up blank. Most humans weren't even aware demons existed, but angels had to know about them. According to the information in Heathcliff's journal, their sole purpose was to protect humans. At least that was the chayot angels' job. Maybe it was different for the others?

I thought again about the lights that had buzzed around me after the Devil flung me in here. What were those lights? Could they be angels?

"What are you doing down here?" I jumped as Wrythe interrupted my thoughts. My eyes flew open and I realized my face was wet.

"Nothing." I cleared my throat. "I mean, I needed to grab my weapons," I said pointing at the knife and gun. I tried to stand and wipe my cheeks at the same time, hoping he wouldn't see my tears.

Wrythe sat down beside me before I could regain my feet, then handed me a handkerchief. "Is there anything I can do?"

"No, I'm fine," I lied.

"Then you're doing better than me," he admitted, pulling his knees up, resting his forearms on them.

“Are you hurting, sire?” It hadn’t been that long ago that he’d been near death.

He blew out a breath. “Not physically. But I am mentally exhausted.” He rested his head against the wall, studying me. “You realize how long I’ve been responsible for the Moths?”

“Yes,” I said. I knew how long he’d been king thanks to my history class.

“I’m tired and could use a rest,” he said, his eyes flicking across my face.

“What, like a nap?” I asked, though I knew what he meant.

“No, Alice. Like when you choose for me to die for your second trial.” His gaze was steady. He didn’t even blink.

I looked away, covering my ears, not ready to deal with anything he had to say about it.

He got up on one knee and gently pulled my hands from my ears. “You need to hear this. It’s important.”

“I can’t,” I said, unbidden tears running down my cheeks. “I can’t choose you any more than I can choose Kade.” A sob hitched in my throat and I ground my teeth. Crying was for humans.

Wrythe pulled me into a hug. “You love him,” he said, talking about Kade.

“I do,” I admitted, tucking my head against his shoulder and under his chin.

“But you love me too. I can feel that,” he added.

As much as I didn’t understand the depth of my emotions, I had to come love him, and I didn’t have the strength to lie. “Yes,” I said. “I do love you, Wrythe, but…”

“I know. It isn’t the same.”

I pulled him tighter against me. “You mean so much to me. You’re my family. I can’t imagine my life without you.” I sniffled, enjoying the warm, clean scent of his neck.

“And that’s why I want you to choose me. I’ve lived a long time. I’m ready for some peace and quiet.”

At his words, another sob escaped my throat and I grabbed his shirt into my fists. I appreciated he was trying to make the choice easier on me, but it wasn’t helping. “I can’t,” I said, squeezing my eyes shut.

“You can,” he said, forcing me to look at him. “Alice, you have to choose me. Choosing Kade isn’t an option because you would be sad, and I can’t live knowing your heart is broken.” The kindness and gentleness in his gaze and the selflessness of his words pricked at my heart and before I knew it my lips were on his. At first, he didn’t return it. We sat frozen, our eyes locked on each other as though waiting to see what the other would do. But a moment later, his hands went into my hair as his lips pressed against mine and he closed his eyes. Fire licked low in my belly like a smoldering flame, and I realized that if I hadn’t met Kade, these feelings for Wrythe would be perfect. As his lips moved with mine, I felt whole and complete and beautiful. He pulled me onto his lap and I straddled him, my hands running along his massive shoulders and down his amazing arms before making their way to his face. We were right together. That knowledge sank deep into my soul. We could be together without worry of Wrythe losing a part of himself. But if I chose to be with Kade, and we were together, he would lose his angel essence, whatever that meant.

Wrythe growled low in the back of his throat and deepened our kiss, pushing open my mouth and flicking his tongue inside and my desire for him reached fever pitch. At its peak came a scorching flash of what our future would be. A marriage full of love, hot passion, happiness, and children. He and I would have children together! A life beyond the compound filled with hunting trips, vacations, and worldwide travel. Each image urged me on. Our kisses grew more passionate until I gasped, clinging to him and to what the future held for us.

After several long moments, he released my lips. “Are you sure you love that angel boy more than me? Because that was incredibly hot.” A half smile sat on his face.

I realized how tangled we were in each other and carefully pushed away from him. “I-I should go. I need to get some rest.”

He cleared his throat and stood, pulling me up with him. “You could get some rest in my room. With me.”

If I went with him there would be no rest. Just a glorious night together. And as much as my body wanted to know what that felt like, my mind wouldn’t have it. “I should go to my room,” I said, crossing my arms.

“Very well.” Disappointment hung in his eyes. “Sit next to me at the funeral?”

“Sure,” I said and couldn’t help but wonder how Wrythe would feel if he knew what my mother was.

THE NEXT DAY, after breakfast and a shower, I returned to find a dress and a note on my bed. It was from the woman who ran the team in charge of making the Dark Moth uniforms. She was a mysterious woman who occasionally created something special, not because someone asked for or deserved it, but just because she felt like it. Her name was Haven and she wasn’t a warrior, but a regular Moth. No one knew how she came to be at the compound, but rumor had it Wrythe had brought her with him when he took over as king.

The gossip surrounding Haven hadn’t mattered to me up until I opened my bedroom door and saw the dress lying on my bed. The moment I saw it, I knew it was from her. Tears stung my eyes.

It was completely my style even though before that moment I hadn’t known I had a style. The material was black, made from the same magic as the insignias on my new uniforms. A small white card sat atop it with the words: Fit for a Queen.

“It’s beautiful,” I breathed. I would wear it to the funeral.

Still in my robe, I brushed out my hair, letting it fall past my shoulders. Then studied my face. For once I wished I had makeup to accentuate my features, but it was too late to find some now. Once my hair was up in a bun, I slid the dress over my head. It was soft like butter against my skin. The hem reached to just above my knees, the skirt like hundreds of soft, black petals, the bodice skimming over my chest, waist, and hips perfectly. The sleeves were long but see-through as was a portion of the neckline. I went to the mirror and studied my reflection. In the light, all the colors shone, and for the first time in my life I looked at my reflection and felt beautiful. When I got the chance, I would thank Haven. Somehow, I would find a way. She’d also left me a pair of beautiful black shoes, the material possessed of the same magical qualities as the dress. I slid them on and wasn’t surprised they fit. Everything was perfect. Another quick glance in the mirror and I left my room, making my way to the assembly hall.

Everyone liked Peter or at least respected him, so the hall was crowded. I made my way through the throng, saying hello to the few people who waved at me first. My hope was to find a seat near the front. Wrythe had asked me to sit next to him, but he was sitting on the stage, as he should. I didn’t want to be up there again. There was a chair available beside him, but surely that wasn’t for me.

Several teachers sat up there as well, including Grayson. Wendy stood behind him, her eyes puffy and swollen. I wanted to comfort her, but my gaze kept returning to the coffin settled in the middle of the stage. Along both sides and the back of the open casket were bright, beautiful bouquets of flowers looking as though they were begging the grave mourners to find some happiness. The coffin itself was a purple so deep it was almost black. The inside had been lined with a lavender satin. Lying within was Peter Jordan.

Wrythe noticed me and stood, waving me over. He wore a black suit tailored to fit him flawlessly. Underneath was a black silk shirt open at the collar. His hair hung to his broad shoulders, which were back. As king, he carried the weight of the whole Society.

I tilted my head, shaking it slightly and pointing to a chair near the front.

He put his hands together as though he were praying. Begging me to join him. I couldn't tell him no. There was too much pain on his face. Too much hurt in his eyes. The man was suffering, and I had to be there for him. Offering a small internal sigh, I went around to the right side of the stage and climbed the stairs. He met me at the top and took my hand in his before tucking it into the crook of his arm.

"You look extraordinary," he said, his voice soft and full of emotion, "though your lips are still a little swollen by the looks of it."

I glanced up at him, surprised, but before I could say anything, Wendy ran over and threw her arms around me. "I hate these things, don't you?" she whispered.

I definitely wasn't a fan. "It's hard to say goodbye," I said, hugging her back.

Her eyes roamed over my dress as she wiped at her tears. "You look divine. Where did you get that dress?"

Wrythe saved me from needing to explain. "Dearest Wendy, I'm going to take Alice to her seat now."

"I guess I should get back to standing behind Grayson." She rolled her eyes. "I'm the man's security detail for the night."

Was that code for his date? I didn't know. "Talk to you later, Wendy."

She took her place behind Grayson and my gaze found Wrythe's.

"Haven made that for you, didn't she?" Wrythe asked me, though he already knew the answer. "I didn't want you to have to tell Wendy. She would've been green with jealousy and she wasn't even sired by an Envy demon.

"Thank you." I sat in the chair he'd saved for me, resting my hands in my lap. Wrythe sat beside me. From my vantage point, I watched the Dark Moths and the trainees amble about, talking amongst themselves, and wondered what they were saying. After a few moments, I decided I didn't want to know.

Finally, Wrythe stood and went over to the podium.

Over the next hour, several people, including his wife got up and spoke about Peter and what an amazing man he was. When they finished, we clapped. It hadn't been planned, but the mood had lifted, making the funeral feel like a celebration of Peter's life.

Finally, Wrythe turned to look at me. "Did you want to say something, Alice?"

I nodded. With effort, I made my way over. Wrythe stood to the side. I cleared my throat, taking a moment to gather my thoughts. "Not too long ago, Peter, Wrythe, and I were out on a hunt and Peter said he didn't know why he came with me since he considered himself nothing more than a sidekick." The audience laughed. I laughed too, then paused, licking my lips. "At the time, I didn't tell Peter how I felt about him and how much it meant to have him there. It seems appropriate I tell him now." I clasped my hands together nervously. "Peter was an amazing fighter. Loyal to a fault. He stood up for me on more than one occasion and he made sure I received the help I needed. Though he was my teacher, I considered him more than a friend. He was my family." Tears pressed against the backs of my eyes. "I still can't believe he is gone and I miss him terribly, but I'll always keep the memory of him in my heart." Without thinking about it, I pounded my fist against my chest and then raised it toward the ceiling, spreading my first and middle fingers apart in the peace sign. I don't know why I did it, but I did. After that, I turned and went back to my seat, trying not to be embarrassed.

No one made a sound and I felt odd, like I'd said something wrong. But then finally everyone began clapping and relief washed through me. Anyone who said they didn't care what others thought of them was lying to themselves—at least a little bit.

Afterward, Wrythe and several of the teachers took the casket above ground by way of the elevator with Peter's wife, Sarah trailing behind. Her eyes were red and swollen. I wished I could do something to ease her suffering, but only time could do that.

As I watched them go, I thought about where Dark Moths were buried. There was a cemetery dedicated to our kind, though I didn't think the owner knew what we were, only that we'd purchased most of the plots. The burial site would be respectable and worthy of Peter, I was sure.

When they'd all left the room, I glanced out at the crowd and saw Kade sitting near the back. Had he been there the whole time?

He started up the aisle, heading toward the exit and away from me.

Kade, I called to him in my mind.

Meet you in your room, he responded.

OceanofPDF.com

WHEN I RETURNED to my room, Kade was there, sitting on my bed. His handsome features twisted with anguish. When he saw me, he stood. “The two of you look perfect together,” he said, heaving a deep breath that sounded almost like defeat.

I knew he meant Wrythe and me. “Kade, he needs me right now,” I said, the words sounding lame even to my ears. “He’s all alone.” I wanted him to understand, even though I still didn’t—at least not fully.

“He isn’t alone, Alice. We were just in a room filled with Dark Moths, many of whom would serve Wrythe well.” The anguish on his face turned sour.

“It’s just… you’re right. They would serve him. But that isn’t what he needs.” I wouldn’t act like I knew Wrythe better than anyone else, but I did know a little.

“I know what he wants,” Kade said, his hands pressed together into fists at his side. The man was jealous. Was that even possible? Could angels get jealous? “Or more appropriately, I know who he wants.”

He was talking about me. Images of the future I saw with Wrythe flashed through my mind again. I shook it all away. “Look, Wrythe has lost everyone he trusted. I can’t abandon him too. That wouldn’t be right.”

Kade brushed at a fly. We rarely got them so far down, but when we did, they were hard to get rid of and extremely annoying. Distracted, I went after it, chasing it around the room. Eventually it flew up into the corner where the yellow and black spider had built her web. The fly ambled like he would fly into it, but at the last second swerved away. Frustrated, I grabbed a sock, trying to knock the fly out of the air. Behind me Kade was laughing, obviously amused by my antics. He certainly wasn’t helping. The fly went back over to the spider's web and flew right into it. I'd barely stopped before the spider went to work.

"'Step into my parlor," said the spider to the fly," Kade whispered, coming up behind me.

"It's gross," I said as we watched the spider wrapped the fly in a white orb before placing it up in the corner of her web. A treat for later, I thought, disgusted.

"It's life," he said, his face illuminated. The man was breathtaking and as he stood there with his hands on his hips, I thought about Heathcliff's journal. Page thirty-two to be exact. Without thinking, I pulled him to me. His eyes darkened like he knew instinctively what I wanted, and he leaned down, kissing me passionately. I tried to see a future with him. One that would involve children or at least the two of us living our eternity together, but nothing came. Irritated, I kissed him more deeply. He lifted me into his arms and I wrapped my legs around his hips. Though I couldn't see our future, I felt the oneness, the all-consuming passion, the need for him and only him for the rest of my life. Why couldn't I see a future with him? I pulled away, frustrated.

"What's gotten into you?" he asked, gently probing his lip where I'd bitten him in the heat of the moment.

There was so much. Too much for me to even know where to begin, so I asked the first random question that came to mind. "Do you have wings?"

He stared down his nose at me. "Of course I do."

I hadn't expected that answer. I mean I had, but at the same time... I definitely hadn't. "You do? Why haven't I seen them?" Before I finished speaking, he'd popped them out with a sound like an umbrella opening in a rainstorm.

Gasping at the sight, I covered my mouth. "They're beautiful," I said through my fingers.

He glanced over each shoulder. "They are amazing, aren't they?"

He crossed his arms, rolling his shoulders back, ruffling the feathers before stretching them out slightly.

Our disagreement concerning Wrythe was momentarily forgotten and I dropped my hands. “Do all angels have wings?”

“Yes, we do.”

“But you don’t need them to get around.” It was a statement. I’d never seen his wings, yet Kade had popped in and out of my life just fine for weeks.

“Right. We don’t need them so there are those who just don’t ever use them, especially those of us who frequently interact with humans. It would be very difficult to talk to a human with these sticking out of our backs on a regular basis. Most would react the same way you are, by staring at them. And we don’t want that.”

I hadn’t realized I was staring until he said something. But I couldn’t help it. His wings were magnificent, stark white except at the feathery ends, which appeared to have been dipped in the same emerald color as his eyes.

He tucked his wings against his back. “Seen enough?” He shrugged, nonchalant, but I could tell he was enjoying himself. I was surprised he hadn’t shown them to me before now. He seemed… proud of them.

It was cute.

“No way,” I said, coming closer. “May I touch them?” My hands hovered, waiting for him to answer.

“Well, I don’t know. Have you washed your hands?” He took hold of my fingers, turning them over, studying my palms.

His touch sent waves of desire through my body. “Are you serious?” I swallowed against my need. I would go wash my hands if that would make him happy.

Kade winked. “I’m teasing. Please, go ahead.”

I moved to get a better look at them. They were huge, nearly reaching the middle of his calves and they had a scent that was hard to describe, like light and sunshine and cinnamon. I reached out, but hesitated. “Why don’t I have wings?” The words came out just as I thought them, so I hadn’t had time to filter the question.

He let out a deep breath as though frustrated. His body shook slightly, and his wings vanished.

“Hey,” I said, stroking the place where the wings had come out. He froze at my touch and I wondered why.

“Our wings are a gift. They represent our differences from humans and are symbolic of heaven, not to mention…” He let the words trail off. “There’s so much you need to learn about the angelic part of yourself, Alice.” He shook his head as though overwhelmed with all I still needed to know.

“Is that why I don’t have wings? Because I’m the Devil’s daughter?” It made sense. If wings were a gift from Heaven, surely demon offspring wouldn’t receive such things.

“Well, let’s see.” He walked around to my back, his fingers running along my spine. His touch sent a wave of longing crashing through my body, but no wings appeared. “Interesting,” he said. “I would’ve thought you didn’t have wings, except I felt your response to my touch just now.” His fingers moved along the same spot at the other side of my back. Again, my body reacted to him. But I couldn’t help it. The feel of his fingers against my skin was sensual, but that could’ve just been because I loved the feel of his touch. “Wings may be in your future, Alice Blackburn. You just need some training.”

I faced him, trembling in confusion and hungry to have his mouth on mine again. “How do you know?” I asked, my throat parched.

“Your reaction. It’s an angel thing. We are extremely sensitive to any kind of touch at the area where our backs connect with the wings.” He smirked, beaming with happiness.

“That’s a good thing?” I relaxed a little.

“A very good thing,” he said, taking my hand. “But hey, the reason

I'm here is because I want to take you somewhere. Like on a date."

I cocked my head, studying him. "Really? Do you think we have time?" That hadn't been where I'd expected things to go and my stomach flip-flopped, unsure of his abrupt subject change.

"We've established we love each other but we've never been on an official date. It's about time I took you on one, don't you think?"

He was right, of course. I'd never been on a date, period. With anyone. "Okay, sure, but can we go tomorrow?" I still needed to attend the interviews with Wrythe for the new council.

He pulled me into his arms, wrapping his hands around my waist. "I suppose." He peered down his nose at me. "I'll be back in the morning. Wear something comfortable." He gave me a quick kiss and vanished.

Had I hurt his feelings? I hoped not.

I changed into my new warrior uniform, unable to help but think of Wrythe and our kiss as well as our conversation. Are you sure you love him more? After tugging on my boots, I tucked my knife and the demon orb down the side of one. I'd tried putting the orb in my sock drawer or someplace else safe, but it seemed to call to me. I decided it was best to keep it close at all times.

With a heavy sigh, I left my room.

THE CLOCK SAID seven in the morning, but it felt like I'd just closed my eyes. I rolled onto my side, away from the clock, wishing I could go back to sleep.

A knock came at the door. I hoped I could ignore whoever it was, and they'd go away. Instead I heard the light whoosh of paper being slid under the door. I sat up and climbed out of bed. It was an envelope with the king's insignia stamped in red wax across the opening. I ran my fingers underneath until the wax cracked free.

Inside was a red and black invitation inviting me to the coronation of the new council members. He'd already picked them? We'd done the interviews yesterday after Peter's funeral and up until the party that night. After each interview was over, we discussed who he thought would be the best fit, but I hadn't realized he would decide so quickly. Why had he rushed it? I read the names. The seven he selected were good Dark Moths. I knew them, some better than others, but all would do. They were the ones I would've selected.

According to the invitation, we would meet in the assembly hall at five o'clock where there would be the induction ceremony in front of all Dark Moths and trainees. Afterward was a dinner followed by a private ceremony only the eight of us would attend. There had been a lot of freaking ceremonies and parties and a funeral the last couple of days and I was exhausted, but it was also a little exciting. The ceremonies were necessary. The Society's way of doing things. Everything was happening so fast. I wasn't ready to be a council member any more than I was ready to go to the angel realm.

I took a deep breath, resigning myself to the events that would occur later today. And then I thought of Kade, and my pulse raced. He was going to take me on a date!

As I dressed and got ready, I tried to tamp down the nervous energy in my stomach. While tying the laces of my boots, I heard a tinkling bell. Then Kade suddenly stood directly in front of me, a small bell in one hand. I jumped, and a small scream escaped my lips.

Kade smiled big and I wanted to punch him in the face. "What?" he said innocently. "I rang the bell."

I couldn't help but smile too, and I did punch him, but in the arm and lightly. "You still scared the hell out of me."

"Sorry," he said, though it was obvious he wasn't. "Ready to go?"

I hadn't eaten, but realized I wasn't hungry. "Sure, let me just put this over here." I placed the invitation on my bedside table.

"What is that?" He picked it up. As he read, his face turned serious. "Today? He wants to induct you today?" His words sliced through the air like razorblades on paper.

“What’s the big deal? If not today, then in the next couple of days. There isn’t a lot of time until…” I couldn’t finish.

His anger dissipated and he rubbed a hand over his face. “You’re right. I’m sorry.” He placed the card back on the table and came over to me, wrapping his arms around my waist. “I want to kiss you.”

“I won’t stop you,” I said, breathing in his heady scent.

He leaned down, pressing his lips against mine. That was all it took to send all thoughts from my head. There was just Kade and how much I wanted him.

After several long minutes, he released me, and I sighed, opening my eyes to discipline him for stopping. And I realized we were no longer in my room, but above ground, outside, behind an RV.

“Where are we?” I asked, stepping from his arms.

He took my hand. “Come on,” he said, pulling me.

“Are we still in Arizona?”

“We are,” he began, indicating the view.

I stopped, admiring it. The blue sky went on forever.

“It’s called Monument Valley,” he said. “Haven’t you heard of the place?”

It thought I had, but I couldn’t remember where. “Are we camping,” I asked, thinking it might be fun. Wendy had told me about the one fun experience she had growing up with her foster family, which was roasting marshmallows over a campfire. I’d always wanted to try that.

“Not today. We’re taking a tour, if you’re up for it.” As he spoke, he took my hand and led me over a grassy knoll to where a large group of people waited. At the front of the group stood a man with short black hair and copper skin. He was tall and muscular and wore a beige tee shirt, jeans, and cowboy boots. His voice had a lilt that made me want to get closer in order to hear what he was saying.

“Come on,” I said, moving past Kade, pulling him toward the group.

“There will be six to a jeep, including your tour guide. Please keep your seatbelts buckled at all times unless myself or one of the other guides tells you it’s okay to get out.” The man had his hands tucked in his front pockets. “Now, are there any questions?”

“Can we take pictures on the drive?”

“Of course.” He smiled genially. “We’ll take our time and give you plenty of photo opportunities. Plus, we’ll make plenty of stops, I promise. Anything else?”

No one responded.

“Very good. As you get in, be sure to present your tour guide with your tickets. We will be checking that your tickets are for this time as well as that you are in the right place with our touring company.” When he finished speaking, he walked over to the jeep closest to him. “Saddle up, boys.”

“Do we have tickets?” I asked, watching the tourists hand over their tickets to be checked by the guides.

Kade winked, pulling two tickets from his back pocket. “It wouldn’t be a date without them.”

“Cool,” I said, curious whether he retrieved those tickets by angelic means or come out here and bought them. “How did you get those?”

“I know what you’re insinuating, but I can assure you, I got them in a completely lawful and ordinary way.”

“I believe you,” I said, though it was only half true. We were the last two to get loaded in the vehicles. The first four had already taken off down the hill as Kade and I walked to our driver.

“I guess it’s just us,” Kade said.

“Great.” The man took the tickets Kade handed him. After viewing them, he scrutinized Kade. “Are you sure?” he asked, glancing at me.

Kade nodded.

The two men stared at each other for several long moments. If I didn't know any better, I would think they were talking to each other in their minds the way Kade and I could. At that thought, I studied the copper man more intently. Did Kade know him? Before I could ask, the man tucked our tickets in his back pocket then held open the closest passenger door. "Climb in and buckle up."

I did as he said, curious about what was going on. If Kade knew him then did that mean the man was an angel, or was he a friend from when Kade had been living like a human and working at the Caterpillar Place mechanic shop?

Kade climbed in on the other side. "Do you know that man?" I asked.

"No," he said, but didn't elaborate.

A lightbulb went off in my head. I'd read about Monument Valley in one of my human history classes. According to what I'd learned, it was considered hallowed ground, making it impossible for demons or even half demons to step foot on the land without excruciating pain or death." At that thought, my heart raced. Would I burn up? I was half demon, after all. You are half angel too, I thought and that calmed me down a little.

The tour guide climbed in the jeep and turned on the engine. "My name is Toby Gardner. If you have any questions, don't hesitate to ask." Toby caught my eyes in the rear-view mirror. "You ever been here before?"

"First time," I said, glancing out the window. Enormous sandstone buttes rose from the red desert sand. One in particular reminded me of a castle I'd seen in a book when I was little. It was magnificent, and I couldn't pull my eyes from it.

"Gorgeous, isn't it?" Toby asked, a small smile on his lips.

"Yes," I admitted, tearing my eyes away long enough to study Kade. His face was a mask and I couldn't read him. "What are you up to?"

"You'll see," he said, giving me a secret smile.

“Our tour today with include the lesser known caves on the eastern side of our most popular butte,” Toby said, using his tour guide voice. “There will be a small hike involved as well, but I’ve got plenty of granola bars and water in my pack if you didn’t bring anything.”

Maybe I had the whole situation wrong. Maybe Kade just wanted to take me on an amazing first date. He was doing well so far. “Can’t wait,” I said to Toby and then in a lower voice, I spoke to Kade. “I have to be back by three, so I can get ready.”

“We have plenty of time. Promise.”

“I’ll hold you to that,” I said and then relaxed as Toby continued his tour-guide speech, sharing information about the area, the Navajo people who lived there, the land itself, as well as the buttes.

I only half listened until we arrived in front of the butte that reminded me of a castle but was actually called Elephant Butte.

Toby turned off the jeep. “We’ll have to hike the rest of the way.”

By now it was a little after eight and I was hungry. “Mind if I have one of those granola bars now?” I asked Toby sheepishly.

“Not at all.” He handed it to me as he filled a pack with water and granola and then handed it to Kade. “What about you? You hungry?”

“Nah, I’m good.” Kade hefted the backpack.

Toby held out a water bottle. “You’ll probably need this too.”

“Thank you.” I followed after him and Kade. They were moving quickly, and I had to speed up.

The early morning air was still cool, which surprised me for Arizona. “What’s the temperature this morning?” I asked, between bites. I wasn’t a fan of eating and hiking, I decided.

“Fifty-eight degrees,” Toby admitted. “If you’re cold, trust me, it won’t last long.

I nodded because I had a granola bar in my mouth.

We hiked for a while and Toby was right. The sun quickly warmed my skin and soon a light sheen of sweat covered my face, neck, and back, but I didn't mind. I was actually enjoying the hike. Outside in general was still a bit of a novelty for me, considering where I lived on a daily basis. When we reached a small landing on the castle butte, Toby stopped. "Let's take a drink and then we'll continue."

We sat on some rocks to rest and had some more water. The view was almost indescribable with the never-ending blue sky and the salmon-colored sandstone as well as the amazing rocks or buttes randomly coming out of the ground.

"It must be so amazing to work here every day," I said.

"I enjoy it very much," Toby admitted, after taking a swig from his canteen.

"What's the story of this place? How was it created?" I asked, sipping my water.

"Do you want the scientific version, or would you like to hear a Navajo legend?" He smiled, his eyes crinkling at the sides.

"Definitely the legend," I said, eyeing Kade for confirmation.

"I'm all about the legend too," he agreed.

OceanofPDF.com

"THE STORY GOES that my ancestors come from the Winged People," Toby began.

That perked me right up. He didn't say Winged as one syllable, but with two. Wing-ed. I found that interesting and wondered if there was a reason or just the way he'd heard it pronounced.

"My people," he continued, "believe that every one of the buttes and mesas you see is alive and if you listen closely, you can almost hear their hearts beating." He stopped, pausing for dramatic effect.

I leaned back, enjoying the cool rock against my sweaty back. Kade sat beside me and did the same. He took my hand, intertwining my fingers with his.

"Listen," Toby encouraged, though it sounded more like an order.

I tilted my head to the side, straining to hear a heartbeat, but all I heard was the wind whistling through the rock crevices. "There—"

Toby held up his hand and I clamped my mouth shut. "Listen." This time he spoke softly.

I closed my eyes, forcing my mind to focus on a heartbeat. After several minutes, I heard something.

Thump. Thump.

Thump. Thump.

"I hear them," I said, astonished.

Toby seemed stunned too. "I told you," he said recovering quickly. "The reason is because trapped within each of the buttes is a demon."

"What?" I sat up, opening my eyes. That wasn't what I expected.

"It's true," Toby said, glancing nervously at Kade. "But perhaps you'd prefer to hear about how this valley used to be a sea, and over time the wind dug out the buttes?"

“No, keep going. I’m really interested in hearing the end of the story.” I actually wondered if Kade had put Toby up to this. With a quick glance, I realized he had. This was a date, but Kade had ulterior motives. He wanted me to hear this.

“It’s just a legend, Alice,” Kade said, rubbing my back. But his face revealed that wasn’t true. His fingers fondling the sensitive area on my back distracted me, sending slow, curling tendrils of desire through my body. Stop it, I shouted into his mind.

Sorry, he replied, but winked, letting me know he really wasn’t.

Jerk, I returned, but winked back before returning my attention to Toby. “Please continue, Toby.”

“It goes like this. Our parents came from another world known simply as The Original. There they were nothing more than entities with no way to move on. One day, two bright lights appeared, admonishing them to travel through the nine worlds in order to reach their final destination. The lights explained that travelling through the worlds would allow them to become who they were meant to be. Many followed, hungry for more, but some stayed. Those who travelled to the second world were given sight. Entranced by all they could see, some remained behind, happy with only their sight. The remainder went to the third world where they received their hearing. Some settled again. In the fourth world, they received the ability to communicate. Yet again some remained. By the fifth world, they were given bodies, and this is where it gets interesting. Many settled there, so taken with their form that they couldn’t believe there was more. In this world those who stayed behind became demons.”

I glanced at Kade, my mouth suddenly dry. Do you believe this, I asked. Is this why you brought me here? I had to know.

I wanted you to hear a little bit of the angel histories. It isn’t completely accurate, but it’s interesting, don’t you think? He gave me a reassuring look.

Toby continued speaking, oblivious to our byplay. “In the sixth world, they were given wings and the angels were created. Now they could fly, and many made their home there, happy with all they had. The entities tried to encourage them on, saying there was still so much more, but they refused to leave. In the seventh world, those continuing on received the ability to feel. They were given emotions." Toby cleared his throat. "Things got chaotic there. The entities encouraged them to keep going. When those who continued reached the eighth world they received the ability to think. Now that they could choose what to do, some went back to the other worlds and became archangels and archdemons. They ruled over those worlds. In the ninth world, they were given the power of creation. But instead of using the gift for good, there came greed, power, and corruption.

"The bright lights were devastated, unable to believe that after all they'd given the beings, they would use their gifts in a corruptible way. As a last resort, the bright lights offered to send the precious few still following them to a new world with the promise that they would keep balance and treat the land and those around them with respect. They came into this world from the cave we're in now and referred to themselves as the Winged People.

"Before they left the ninth world, the bright lights said they would destroy all of the previous worlds, but my ancestors believe something must've gone wrong because a hundred years or so after the Winged People arrived in this valley, creatures began leaking into our world. Some were gruesome and pus-riddled while others were devastatingly glorious and too beautiful to behold. The Winged People fought against them, but the creatures' powers had grown too strong. As a last resort, the queen of the Winged People went to the dragon Abernathy, and asked him for help. The dragon agreed to help in exchange for her people's wings. One spell turned those creatures who'd already crossed into our world to stone, which are the buttes you see within this valley, and the other was used to permanently close the gate between our world and the others."

"Wait," I said, holding up my hands. "This is crazy." My eyes darted between Kade and Toby, hoping one of them would tell me Toby made up the story.

Toby crossed his arms. “Alice, it isn’t crazy. It’s the legend of my people.” He was dead serious.

“And your people are?” I asked, trying to stay relaxed.

Toby glanced at Kade. I could see he was conflicted.

“Are you an angel?” I asked, deciding there was no point skirting around what I knew to be true.

“I’m a chayot,” Toby said, nodding, obviously more than a little frustrated.

I glared at Kade. He knew I wasn’t ready for the angel parts of myself, yet he brought me to speak with an angel. “Why?”

“It’s important you know something of your heritage, especially since you won’t let me take you to the angel realm.”

I stood, ready to go. “I want to—”

“Hello?” A woman with bright red hair the color of fire came up the trail we’d walked, a cheerful grin on her face. She was petite, shorter than me, with creamy skin and blue eyes. She had on khaki shorts and a black tee shirt. A black bandana covered some of her hair and on her feet were thick socks and hiking boots. She looks the part, I thought.

Toby stood. “Hey, what are you doing up here?” He put his hands on his hips and moved toward her. “You shouldn’t be here,” he said when he came to a stop.

“Sorry,” she said, sheepish. “I was busy taking pictures and got distracted. By the time I realized what I’d done, the rest of my group was gone. Do you mind if I hang out with you?”

Toby regarded us before facing the woman. “I suppose that’ll be fine. We were going to check out one of the lesser known caves.”

“Awesome.” She stepped around Toby and came over to me, sticking out her hand. “I’m Joannie.”

I stood, taking her hand. “Alice,” I said, shaking it. “And this is Kade.”

“Nice to meet you.” She gave him a bashful wave.

“And my name is Toby,” our chayot guide said. He seemed flustered as he walked over to us. “Which guide were you with?” he asked. “You look familiar.”

“Oh,” Joannie said, placing a hand on the back of her neck, trying to think. “What was his name?” She fanned herself. “Gu— Gle— Gan… Oh, I’m feeling dizzy.” She started falling backward. I was closest and caught her. She blinked up at me. “Thank you. I think I’m a bit thirsty.”

Toby handed her a bottle of water. “Have you been on the tour before?”

She opened it and took a large drink. “Yes, I come probably once a week.” She poured some water on the back of her neck. “I don’t know why, but I’m happiest when I’m here.” She smiled.

Toby gave her a strange look, as though he might know why.

Was she an angel too?

“When you’re ready, Joannie, we need to continue,” Toby said.

I helped Joannie over to the spot where I’d been sitting and eased her down. “How much farther to the caves?” I asked Toby, ignoring the amused look on his face.

“Not far.”

I was still having a hard time believing Kade put Toby up to that story of the Winged People and Abernathy, but I didn’t feel right arguing the point further with Joannie around, especially since she hadn’t been there for the story. She might think talk of Winged People and dragons a bit crazy and who could blame her, unless she was an angel too.

A few minutes later, Joannie said she felt better and we started back up the trail. Toby led the way and Kade followed him. Behind them, Joannie and I made small talk.

“So, Alice, is this your first time visiting Monument Valley?”

“It is,” I said.

“How are you liking it? Like I said, I’ve come out here many times, but I’ve never been up this far.” She lowered her voice. “It might sound weird, but it feels like this butte is calling to me.”

“Oh?”

Her face turned the same shade of red as her hair. “I mean I know that sounds crazy, but it’s true. That’s why I left my group and came up here. I wanted to find out why.” She paused, observing the whole valley. “Regardless, the views are really spectacular.”

“It doesn’t sound crazy at all,” I said, then paused. “I’m supposed to be on a date.” I should’ve been embarrassed, but even though she was a complete stranger, I was instantly comfortable around her.

“It isn’t going well?”

“No,” I admitted, studying Kade’s back as he walked.

“Well, when you get a moment between the two of you, perhaps you could play twenty questions,” Joannie said, smiling lightly.

“Twenty questions?” I’d never heard of the game, probably because the only games I ever played involved slaying demons.

“Yeah, it’s where you take turns asking each other questions you want to know. Like, if you and I were playing, I would ask where you were from?”

I smiled as understanding of the game dawned on me. It was quite simple, and I felt foolish for my confusion. Nothing new. I had a way with weapons and demon hunting, but real conversations with other people were sometimes a struggle. “Arizona. You?”

“Same. I live in a small town called Wonderland.” She shook her head, sending her flaming hair over her shoulder. “You’ve probably never heard of it.”

I stopped, scrutinizing her. “I’m from Wonderland too.”

Her eyes widened in surprise. “No way. Small world.”

“I guess so,” I said, and started walking again.

“Next question,” Joannie said, giggling. “What’s your favorite color?”

“Black,” I said quickly and then hesitated. “Well, you know, I’ve never really thought about it.” I shrugged. “Yeah, I guess black. What about you?”

She tugged on her hair. “Red or a variation of it. How many brothers and sisters do you have?”

I felt my lips turn into a frown. “Only child,” I said after a moment. “You?”

“I-I had brothers and sisters.” She didn’t seem sure of that answer and I raised my eyebrows. “They died,” she finished, dropping her gaze to her boots. “I think so, anyway.” She ran a hand over her face. “Lately, I’ve been struggling to know what’s real and what isn’t.” She eyed me as though I would run away screaming.

“I’m so sorry. Did something happen to you?” She did seem a little off.

She shook her head. “Everything was fine. I had a job, uh, working as a nurse, and then sometime in the last week or so, I started having these dreams—or visions—I’m not sure.” She tucked her hands into her back pockets. “I know it sounds crazy, but that’s the truth.” She shook her head, looking mortified. “Probably too much information, right?”

“Not at all,” I said, giving her what I hoped was a dazzling smile. “What happened sounds awful. Maybe you should see a doctor. I know a good one. Maybe he could help.” As soon as I said it, I regretted it. How would I even bring up the subject with Heathcliff. Plus, it wasn’t like he was my personal physician. The man had a life outside of Demonland.

She laughed. “That might be a good idea,” she said. “Next question. Where were you born?”

I didn't know what to say. I guessed Wonderland, but I wasn't sure. I hadn't ever seen my birth certificate. No time to hunt one down when you're training to fight demons all day every day. "Wonderland," I offered, figuring it was the best answer. "You?"

"Same," she admitted, though by the look on her face, I wasn't sure she really knew. The woman, though she seemed kind and sweet, was also having a hard time determining the difference between reality and fiction. Or maybe she was an angel, the same as Kade and Toby, but was acting. "What do you want to be when you grow up?" she asked.

The question punched me in the guts. Until a couple of days ago, I'd believed I knew that answer. Now though, I had no idea, and I wanted to be done with the game. "Thanks, Joannie. I'll definitely play the game with Kade," I said, sidestepping her question.

Her face fell in disappointment. "Okay. Good."

We caught up with the guys just as we came to the cave's entrance.

"I've got headlamps for the three of us, but I don't have one for you," Toby said to Joannie. "I do have a regular flashlight though." He handed them out. I put mine on my head and Toby turned it on.

Kade put his on, and I chuckled. "If I weren't so frustrated with you, I'd think you were hot," I admitted.

He gave me a lopsided grin. "Well if we weren't here with other people, I would totally make out with you," he returned, eyeing my head gear. He stood directly in front of me. "There, that's better," he said, brushing his thumb across my cheek. "You had some dirt."

"Thanks." I pulled Kade off to the side. "Do you know Joannie? I think she might literally be going insane," I whispered.

He gave the woman a once over and I did the same. Then shook his head. Toby was speaking softly to her, but he didn't seem to know her either.

"I don't think so," he said. "But it's strange. She feels familiar, if that makes sense."

“Could it be an angel thing? Could she be an angel and you not know it?” I didn’t think it likely, but then I didn’t know how many angels existed. If there were billions of humans, there could be that many angels or more.

He shook his head. “No. Angels can see the auras of other angels.” He studied her more closely. “I don’t know,” he said. “It’s like she had an aura, but it was burned away.” He tilted his head to one side. “I don’t think she’s human either—at least not any more.”

“What could she be?” There was still so much I didn’t know about supernaturals and life outside of Demonland.

“Let’s go,” Toby said before Kade responded. “Stay close and remember to listen to what I say.” His eyes lingered on me.

“I will,” I said, feeling defensive. Sheesh.

Joannie moved beside Toby as he entered the cave while Kade and I followed after them.

I fixed the lamp on my forehead, so it shone straight forward again as I stepped into the dark opening alongside Kade. The four of us were just beyond the entrance and we all stopped a moment, waiting for our eyes to adjust to the dark.

“You can explore the grand entrance on your own for a few minutes, but don’t go beyond. Understand?” Toby said, heading farther in.

Kade shifted beside me. “I’m going to talk to Toby for a minute. Enjoy and study the walls. I believe you’ll find the hieroglyphs most interesting.” As he walked away, I reminded myself to be grateful he didn’t just vanish, like he had before. For him, that was progress. Who knew? Maybe in a year or ten we might be able to spend an entire morning together without him disappearing on me.

“I will?” I asked after him.

“Most definitely. Start there.” Kade pointed to my left

I went that direction, figuring I could go around the circular cave clockwise. When the light struck the red clay, the first thing I noticed was what appeared to be a black smudge. I continued on, walking the cavern slowly, allowing my light to shine over each drawing. After a few minutes, I understood that the drawings were a depiction of the story of the Winged People.

"This is so weird," Joannie said falling in beside me. "Am I right?"

"It's interesting," I admitted, crossing my arms. The air inside the cave was much cooler than outside and my skin prickled with goosebumps. And it smelled… like what I wasn't sure. Dirt. Death, maybe. And sulfur. At that, I paused. Had Toby been telling the truth? Was there really a demon imprisoned within this butte? After all I'd read and seen lately, anything was possible.

"Pictures of angels?" Joannie pointed at the person with wings drawn in white. The image stood out starkly against the red wall.

"Looks like it," I said. When I reached the depiction of the seventh world, I saw an opening in the cave wall. Curious, I peered in, but the passage was black as night and curved, making it impossible to see what lay beyond.

"What do you think is back there?" Joannie asked the question I'd been wondering.

"I'm not sure, but I believe we're going to get to find out." I searched the cavern for Toby and Kade, but it was so huge and so dark, I couldn't see anything beyond where the beam of my headlamp reached. "Kade," I called. But he didn't answer. Kade, I said in my mind.

It's all right. I'm with Toby. We'll be right back.

Where are you?

Hang on, he said.

"Men," I griped out loud, stomping my foot.

"You're so right," Joannie said, putting her hands on her hips.

"You want to have a look and see what's beyond the cavern?" I asked, feeling rebellious. Toby told us to stay put, but I wasn't having that. I could do what I wanted.

"Yeah, I do," Joannie said, totally willing to go against our guide's orders. I should've known. She hadn't listened to her first guide, either.

"Follow me." I stepped into the corridor. It wasn't wide, nor was it very tall. Kade and Toby would be able to walk it without issue, but Wrythe would have to stay bent in order to traverse its length. I reached out my hands, touching the cool walls on either side as I led the way. The walls were rough and left dirt on my fingertips. After travelling several minutes, I was about to tell Joannie to turn around when the path opened into another cavern. I couldn't tell how big it was, but it felt enormous. "Let's check it out," I said to Joannie.

"Lead the way," she said. I studied her reaction to make sure she was serious. She smiled, encouraging me on. It was odd, but I felt a real connection to this quirky woman. She didn't look much older than me. Maybe late twenties or early thirties. Giving myself a mental shake, I brought my brain back to the task at hand. It seemed logical to begin by searching the walls the way we had in the grand cavern. There weren't any drawings until we reached the deepest point in the cave. There I saw the first drawing. It was like the one of the angels in the first cave. Beside the angel stood an enormous monster with green light drawn around it. "An Envy demon," I said, recalling the seven deadly sins and their corresponding colors. Pride equaled purple. Greed was gold. Wrath manifested as red. Lust was represented by pink. Gluttony was orange, and Sloth demons were represented by the color blue.

"A what?" Joannie asked, coming in closer with her flashlight. Then she pulled back. "That's gross."

"Agreed." I moved along the back wall and realized all seven of the deadly sins were represented along with their color, including the Devil who was drawn in black. As I went on, there was a picture of an angel and the Devil standing together holding a baby. I drew in a sharp breath. Holy crap! Was that a depiction of what happened between my mom and dad? Or was I being arrogant. Perhaps the Devil had hooked up with many angels over the millenniums.

"What is it?" Joannie asked, coming over. She shone her light on the picture.

I couldn't move, unable to stop the images and conversation Kade and I had where he told me I was half angel as well as the Devil's daughter. Kade's date had been less about hanging out with me and more about following orders. I was getting a lesson on my angelic nature whether I liked it or not.

"This…" Joannie shook her head. "Something's wrong," she said, her hand falling to her side, her light aiming at the ground.

I followed her light, shining mine at the ground as well. "What the hell?" The ground was moving, like writhing snakes.

"Oh my heck," she said, jumping onto the closest rock.

The light seemed to have woken the snakes because they began bucking and slithering in earnest. A serpentine head, complete with eyes and a mouth, rose up from the ground. "Alice," it hissed. "Alice, you've come."

"I think we should get back," I said, grabbing Joannie by the hand and dragging her behind me.

She didn't argue.

We followed the wall until we found the cavern entrance and high-tailed it back to the main cave.

"Alice," Kade yelled as soon as we returned.

"What's wrong?" I felt only slightly guilty that we'd left the cavern without our guide.

"Where have you been?" He came forward and wrapped me in a big bear hug. "I was worried sick."

I shifted so I could face him. "Kade, I'm fine. We weren't gone that long."

“You’ve been gone for hours,” he said, sweat drenching his hair along his hairline.

“There were snakes,” Joannie said, her face white.

“Snakes?” Toby took Joannie by the arm and the four of us exited the cave.

Relief washed over me now that we were back in the light.

“We’ve got to get back,” Kade said.

“Agreed,” Toby added. “Let’s go.”

We walked down the trail silently, Joannie and I sandwiched in between Toby and Kade as though we were trapped animals and the men refused to let us go. In this instance, I was grateful. As we hiked, I mulled over what I’d seen and heard. Finally, I had to verify with Joannie. “Did you hear anything when we were in the second cavern?” I whispered.

“No, but I did see the snakes.” She paused. “It’s weird because that was the first time I’ve seen any of that, yet the whole time I felt like I should’ve known everything about the cavern.” She shook her head as though trying to find the right words to explain. “Like the whole story of the cavern, the snakes, and the reason I feel like this is home is on the tip of my tongue… except I don’t know why.”

I’d felt a longing not because it felt familiar, but because I wanted to know more. “It’s okay, Joannie. I’m sure it’s just the strangeness inside the cavern.” I was glad she’d seen the snakes too. At least I hadn’t gone completely mad.

“I mean I think I did,” she continued. “Did you see snakes?”

“I most definitely did, and they were freaky.”

Joannie sighed, crossing her arms tight against her chest. “I’m so glad you saw them. I-I thought I might had been seeing things again.” Her voice was shaky. “Should we tell the guys?”

I shook my head. “I think it’s better if we don’t.”

Kade barely spoke two words until we were back at our starting point. After exchanging numbers and saying goodbye to Joannie and Toby, Kade, and I walked until we came to a spot behind the hotel where no one could see us. With one final glance to make sure no one was watching, he grabbed my arm and we were back in my room.

“Tell me what happened and leave nothing out,” Kade said, dropping his hand. He began pacing, his biceps and chest muscles taut, his hands clenched in fists.

But I was frustrated with him. “I can’t believe you pretended to take me on a date, but really you were just doing your job.” I crossed my arms in irritation. “You say you love me, but I think you love your job more.”

Kade grabbed me by the shoulders. “You deranged idiot.” Then he paused. “I’m sorry.” He let out a shuddered breath. “I love you more, I swear, but I’m an angel and I wanted you to see we are more alike than you think. That’s why I took you.” He shook his head. “But I am sorry.”

His words placated my frustration. “I appreciate that and I do want to know about the angel side of me, but not like that. I need you to be honest with me,” I said, still feeling sensitive, even though I would tell him what happened.

“You’re right. It’s just…” He ran his hands through his hair. “I was freaking out. The demon within the butte could’ve killed you,” he growled. “Toby told you not to go into another cavern without him.”

I crossed my arms, defensive once again. “True, but I’m sick of doing what I’m told constantly without being given a reason. Why don’t you tell me why else you took me to that place.”

Kade gritted his teeth, his eyes flicking over my face and body, verifying I was okay. “I thought if you were able to hear something of the creation, you might be interested in learning more about angels and decide to come with me.”

Once again following orders. I rolled my eyes. “I am interested, Kade. I never said I wasn’t.”

“Yeah, but you refused to go with me to the angel realm.” His worry turned to dejection.

“Not because I didn’t want to know more. I do. But like I told you, I need to be here for Wrythe.”

Kade nodded solemnly. “So you’ve said.” He sat down heavily on my bed. “Tell me what happened.”

I sat beside him and took his hand. “What’s your favorite color?” I asked.

He shot me a look like I was deranged. “What? Why does that matter?”

I shrugged, bringing his hand to my lips and kissing it lightly. “I just want to know.”

He heaved a deep breath, his eyes searching mine. “Blue,” he said with a smile. “The exact shade of your eyes.”

I blushed, unable to meet his gaze. “Good answer,” I said. Then I told him about the pictures I saw and the writhing snakes and what one of them said.

As I spoke, Kade’s eyes grew wider. “Okay, that’s not good.”

“What does it mean?” I asked, my stomach tangling with worry.

“I’m not sure,” he said, swallowing. “I need to talk to my superiors.” He glanced at the clock. “And you have to be to your Society coronation in forty minutes.”

“Holy crap!” How had I completely forgotten about that? I stood, pulling Kade with me.

He took my other hand, pulling me against him. “Kiss me, Alice Blackburn.”

My angel didn’t have to ask me twice. I reached up, pressing my lips to his. It only took a moment for all of the day’s events to fade away so there was just Kade and me and our love for each other. The moment didn’t last long enough before he pulled away.

“I’ll see you soon,” he said, caressing my cheek.

“See you,” I said to the empty room. I stood there for I don’t know how long, a lingering feeling of irritation and doubt settling over my heart.

OceanofPDF.com

I SHOWERED and put on my Dark Moth uniform, admiring the insignia above my right breast as I stared in the mirror. Haven had somehow captured the colors of the seven deadly sins, but what was even more incredible was the subtle glint of silver throughout. It was remarkable.

My blue eyes seemed brighter than normal. Or it could've been the dark circles under my eyes were making them pop. I braided my hair out of my face. Then I tucked the demon orb in my boot along with my blade. My uniform was a form-fitting jumpsuit made of a smooth material that I knew consisted of organic armor created from elven magic. The problem? There wasn't a place to tuck my gun. I would have to get a thigh strap, which didn't excite me since I preferred to keep my gun hidden. Frustrated, I left the gun on my dresser before making my way to the assembly hall.

Upon entering, I realized every seat was full, causing the overflow of people to take their places along the walls. I made my way over to the stairs. The other seven council members, including Wrythe, were already there. They spoke to each other, standing in a circle.

I tried not to focus on the pang of awkwardness that automatically filled my chest. Perhaps with them, I wouldn't be an outcast—the Queen of Hearts—the way I'd been with the trainees. Hope urged me up the steps to the stage. One of the new council members, Pratt, noticed me, giving me a once over. A smirk lifted one side of his mouth. From what I'd read and heard of Pratt, he was definitely prideful and tended to brag about his incredible hunting skills, but his boasting was justified. He was also loyal and wouldn't give up a fight easily. In all of his demon hunting expeditions, his team had only lost one battle and that wasn't because the demon didn't die. It did, but so had one of his teammates. Still, I didn't appreciate the way he was ogling me. Annoyance trickled through my veins.

Great first impression, I thought, debating whether to run back to my room. Each of the others wore formal attire, suits or dresses as they preferred, the colors representing their demon sire. Pratt wore a deep purple three-piece suit with a white shirt and a lavender tie. Under his gaze, I paused. Why had I worn my damn uniform? I should've put on the beautiful black dress Haven made me. That would've been much better.

I stopped, debating whether I had to time rectify the situation.

"Alice," Wrythe called, leaving the group and walking across the stage. He gave me a once over and I felt my bottom lip quiver. "You look… amazing," he said, touching my arm.

My face warmed. "I should've worn something else." He had on a black suit with a red shirt open at the collar. Handsome, regal and gorgeous.

"No, you're perfect. You'll stand out and be remembered, as you should be." He wrapped me in a hug.

"Thanks," I said, hugging him back and feeling better.

"Anytime. Now, come and sit by me. We're about to start."

I followed him over to the line of chairs situated next to each other on the stage. There were eight chairs total, all with padded seats and intricately carved high backs. Seven of the chairs had seven gems matching the seven vices forming a straight line near the top, while my chair had black gems along the back. The gems were a gift for serving on the council. Once the ceremony was over, they would be extracted and delivered to each council member.

Wrythe's chair had a string of seven rubies and was situated in the center of the stage. He sat and I joined him. The other council members quickly followed.

While we waited for those in the assembly hall to settle down, Grayson came over. He was wearing a tailored charcoal suit with a matching shirt and a bright orange tie to represent his status as the newest Gluttony councilmember. He took my hand and kissed it. The man had a way about him. He drew you in and made you feel special. He did it to every person he came in contact with. Wrythe called him genuine. I could see that.

“Alice, it’s nice to see you. And don’t you look amazing,” he said.

I wasn’t sure whether to believe him or not. “Thanks,” I said before changing the subject. “How’s your wound?” It’d been large and deep when I’d seen it a couple of days ago.

He touched his chest gently. “It’s nearly healed. Heathcliff is a wizard with a needle and thread. I doubt I’ll even have a scar.” He rolled his eyes and we both laughed. Heathcliff and his aversion to scarring was a running joke, but in the best way. We all appreciated and respected Doc.

“That’s great news,” I said.

“It is. Thanks for asking.” His brows scrunched together. “Can we talk at dinner? There is something I’d like to discuss with you.”

That was a strange request. We hadn’t ever had a real conversation. “Of course, Grayson. I’ll look for you.”

“Great.” He went over to his seat on the other side of Wrythe, and sat.

I took stock of the other council members. Besides Grayson, Wrythe, and Pratt was Summer, the Sloth council member. She was incredibly beautiful and always kept her hair up in a plaited crown braid. I’d heard her hair was so long, it went all the way down to her feet, but I’d never seen it out of the braid. A blue ribbon wound through her braid and matched her powder blue suit and a black button up shirt. Her skin was deeply tanned because she spent a lot of time above ground and while she was a slower fighter, she was also concise and brutal—at least from what I’d seen during training sessions. She also had a real way with animals.

Then there was Luke. The Dark Moth had a lust for life, especially when it came to working out and physical fitness. Overly muscled like he spent too much time in the gym, he’d chosen a gray suit and wore a pink shirt underneath, but he also had on a pair of pink dress shoes, which shouldn't have worked, but he made them sexy. The man wore an easy smile and always had a compliment to share. He loved challenging the other Dark Moths as well as the trainees in an annual fitness competition he'd aptly named the Luke Challenge. In it, he would complete a timed series of tasks, then throw down the gauntlet. If anyone could beat his time, he would present them with a prize. I didn't know what the prize was, nor did I care. That sort of contest wasn't my thing.

Sired by an envy demon, Eleanor had on a gorgeous emerald green dress that contrasted beautifully with her rich brown skin. Her hair was held up by two emerald combs. She worked with plants all day long and seemed to like them more then she liked people. But she always had an easy smile and a kind word.

Last was Glenna. Sired by a Greed demon, she had on a long skirt that appeared to have been made of gold thread. It trailed out behind her. Her hair was super short, cut in a pixie style that somehow made her appear more feminine. She specialized in the martial art of muay thai. I'd taken her class one year and learned a lot but still preferred my katanas to hand-to-hand combat. She moved like she floated and every one of her movements had intent.

As soon as the council members were all seated, Wrythe walked over to the podium. "Good evening, friends," he said, his warm voice booming through the room.

Everyone quieted.

"Thank you," he said. "I promise not to keep you all too long. I know Cook has prepared an amazing feast for all of us and I don't know about you, but I can hardly wait to get to that."

The crowd cheered.

"So, let's get started. I will now present each of the new members to you. Some of you may be questioning my choices or the selection process. I understand why, especially since the previous council sought to take my crown and my life. Until very recently, I considered those men and women my colleagues and friends. What you must understand is that it's difficult to fully know a person, as we are always changing. Without a doubt, I believe that when they were selected, their greatest desire was to serve the Society. I know that. What I don't know is when that aspiration changed. If anyone has knowledge pertaining to that particular issue, please make an appointment with my office. I'd be grateful to hear what you have to say." He clapped once. "Enough of that," he said, rubbing his hands together. "Are you ready to meet your new council?"

The whole assembly hall roared to life.

"Excellent." Wrythe turned, studying us. "Grayson," he said.

The Dark Moth nodded and walked over to stand beside Wrythe. "Many of you may not know this, but Grayson and I became fast friends over a difficult game of pool, which he won, and I lost. There was a part of me that wanted to shout, 'Off with his head,' but I refrained." He paused while the crowd laughed.

For the next forty minutes, Wrythe spoke about each of the Dark Moths he'd chosen for the new council. He saved me for last. When he called my name, my heart jumped into my throat, and I couldn't breathe.

When I stood at his side, he put his arm around my shoulders. "By now, many of you know Alice saved my life as well as the lives of several of our newest Dark Moth warriors. She is incredibly intelligent, capable, diligent in completing her tasks, and beyond loyal. To know her is to love her. She is a friend and considers others before herself. I feel lucky to know Alice Blackburn and am grateful she agreed to be on our council."

"Is that a good idea?" someone from the back shouted.

"Having her as a member of the council is one of the best decisions I've ever made." Wrythe's expression was full of confidence and I appreciated it.

“Then I question your ability to lead the Dark Moth Society,” the man continued. He’d been leaning against one of the doorframes, his face in shadow, and I didn’t recognize his voice. When he came forward, I narrowed my eyes, trying to recognize him. But I couldn’t. I’d never seen the man before.

“Seth, you were banished from the Society. How did you get in?” Wrythe’s body went rigid. The muscles in his back and shoulders immediately tensed. At his reaction, my body tensed as well. If there was going to be a fight or some sort of conflict, I would be prepared.

If this man was the Seth we studied in school, he’d been banished for treason over three decades ago. If memory served, he’d tried to overthrow Wrythe after Seth’s twin brother Scott was brutally murdered during one of their hunting expeditions. Seth blamed Wrythe and swore revenge.

Seth smiled, slow and thoughtful. “There are those still loyal to me.”

Grayson and the other council members suddenly stood, flanking Wrythe and me. I let out a small breath. It felt good to have strength in numbers.

“Leave, Seth,” Wrythe growled. “You are not welcome here.”

Seth came fully into the light. “You may have banished me, but some within the Society still remember what you did to my brother. Now that you’ve placed that abomination on your council, even more will turn on you. The crown will be mine as it should be. Just you wait and see.”

“Allow me to go after him, sire. We can imprison him so he can do no more harm,” Grayson said.

“Thank you, Grayson, but I made Seth a promise, and I intend to keep it.” His voice was low and menacing. A chill ran up my spine.

We watched as Seth left the assembly hall. No one said a word to him. Some might still have been loyal to him, but they weren’t so loyal that they wanted to reveal who they were. Cowards! I glanced at Wrythe. Did he feel guilt over the death of Seth's brother? I guessed he did. My king had a kind heart, despite his incredible wrath.

After Seth's interruption, Wrythe finished up quickly and we filed into the cafeteria which had been decorated to look like a great banquet hall in an enormous castle rather than a cafeteria in an underground compound. Cook had outdone herself with roasted turkey, ham, sweet potatoes, mashed potatoes and gravy, fresh baked rolls, green beans, corn on the cob, fresh fruit, and chocolate mousse cheesecake topped with raspberries and cream. I ate until I thought I might pop, it was all so amazing.

Turned out Grayson had only wanted to discuss Wendy with me. He was curious how she had handled Eric's death and my personal opinion of her. I told him all I knew, stating that I couldn't sing her praises loud enough. He thanked me for my time and went back to his seat to eat.

Wrythe sat beside me, but we didn't get much of a chance to talk to each other. Over the course of our dinner, there was a non-stop stream of people coming by to congratulate him or me or both of us, and it was nearly eight o'clock by the time we finally got out of there.

I walked with Wrythe and the others to the elevator that would lead us down to the secret ceremony. Once inside, I eyed the elevator's keypad curiously. The button for level ten had a glass case over it. I hadn't remembered seeing that before, but it was there all shiny and new. When Wrythe pressed his thumb against it, tiny needle-tipped tentacles extended out from the case, angling toward his thumb. Before I could warn Wrythe, they stuck his thumb in ten different places. "Access granted," a female voice said. It came from the plastic case as the tentacles retracted.

I held my breath, waiting for Wrythe to howl in pain, but he didn't even flinch as ten beads of blood appeared, dotting his skin.

It seemed I was the only one to notice. "You'll find out soon enough," he mouthed.

“Fine,” I responded, clasping my hands together in front of me, debating whether I really wanted to find out.

The elevator pulleys whirred to life and the eight of us rode down together in silence. I wondered if the others felt as nervous as I did about what would happen in the secret ceremony. Only Wrythe knew what we were walking into. I guessed it was a secret for a reason.

At D10 the elevator stopped. I’d been in this elevator on multiple occasions, but this floor hadn’t been one of my stops. For some reason, I held my breath, worried about what I might see or hear or feel. When the doors pinged open, it was very anticlimactic. There was nothing. Literally. Beyond the elevator stretched a vast expanse of emptiness. It was rather freaky.

“What am I seeing?” Summer asked.

I was thinking the same thing.

I glanced at Wrythe as he spoke. “Only I can see the truth beyond this elevator. What you’re seeing is nothing, if I’m not mistaken,” he said with a hint of a smile.

“Yeah, is that what we’re supposed to see?” Grayson asked. His voice sounded much calmer than I felt.

“You are the elite, the most important members of the Dark Moth Society. From now on, your life is to serve the Moths, all Moths. But to do that, you must understand and be taught all of the inner workings of the Society. You’ve accepted your call and now must vow to never reveal what you are about to see. Once you do that, you will place your finger on the disc where Dora will verify you are worthy. Only then you will be able to see all there is to see.”

My eyes widened and my heart hammered against my chest, but I couldn’t back out.

One by one, Wrythe asked each new council member the same question. “Do you vow never to reveal what you’re about to see?”

One by one, the answer was the same.

Summer went first. She flinched a moment when the tentacles came out of the box, but she wasn't fast enough to pull away before they caught her. "A Sloth sire," Dora said. "Your blood moves slowly but precisely through your body. Your heart is pure. Access granted."

"Cool," she said, peering out of the elevator. Then she gasped. "What the hell?" She took a hasty step backward, passing me to press her back to the rear wall of the elevator.

"Good plan. Stay there, Summer," Wrythe said, unperturbed by her odd reaction. "That way I can explain to everyone at once."

Pratt went next. Dora pricked him. "A Pride Moth. Hmmmm, can I trust you? The last Pride I tasted was bitter, but he became one of Wrythe's most favored council members. Your blood is filled with more arrogance than his, which I wouldn't have believed was possible. But…" she paused a moment. "You are trustworthy. Access granted."

She pricked Eleanor, Luke, Glenna, and finally Grayson.

"Oh my," Dora said when she tasted the Gluttony Moth's blood. "You are delectable. My favorite so far. Access granted."

There was only me left. Wrythe's face softened when his gaze met mine. "Alice, do you vow never to reveal what you're about to see?"

Did I? My purpose had always been to serve the Moths, and despite the recent knowledge about the angelic part of myself, I still believed I wanted to serve them. I still considered them my family. "Yes, I promise."

"Good. Place you thumb on Dora." He pointed to the clear, plastic bubble over D10.

The tentacles stabbed into me ten times at once. It was quick but didn't hurt. "Oooh," Dora hummed almost as though she were purring. "Your blood is beautiful, full of light and darkness, a combination I've only ever tasted once before. But somehow yours is stronger. You are a born leader, meant to do many great things. But I wonder, is your heart with the Moths?" She paused, and I wondered if I was supposed to say something.

“Most definitely,” I finally admitted, and I meant it, though if I were honest there was a part of me that wanted to know about the other half of myself. What was being an angel like? I pushed the question aside. I was exactly where I was supposed to be.

“Indeed,” Dora said. “I knew it from the moment I tasted your divine blood. Access granted.”

I touched my thumb, thinking it should be hurting, but it wasn’t, and went to stand beside Grayson. The elevator doors normally didn’t stay open for so long, yet these had stayed throughout the whole process.

“Now that you’ve all agreed, and Dora has vetted you, have a look,” Wrythe said, waving his hand in front of the expanse.

I stepped forward with the others, peering out of the elevator. The cavern was no longer filled with great emptiness, but as I stared, my mouth fell open, and I wished it had stayed empty. “What am I seeing?”

“Exactly what you’re supposed to see,” Wrythe said cryptically.

“But this can’t be,” Elanor said.

I had to agree. Dozens of menial demons were bustling around as though they had places to be and jobs to do. Strangely, none of them were gnashing their teeth. Instead, they were all dressed in human cloths—pants to cover up their pus-riddled legs and long-sleeved shirts to cover up their arms and torsos. Some had scarves tied over their heads while others wore hats. It was a sight I never would have imagined. Had I entered an alternate reality?

“Clothes to make,” one of them whispered. It wore pink and carried several bolts of fabric in its arms.

“Shoes to shine,” another said. It was clothed in gold and he had six pairs of shoes flung over his shoulders.

“Floors to scrub.” This one wore blue and carried a mop and bucket of soapy water.

“Toilets to clean.” It was dressed in purple and carried a toilet brush and cleaning rags.

OceanofPDF.com

I BLINKED several times thinking I should pinch myself.

“How is this possible?” Glenna asked, her hands clutching onto Summer’s arm.

“Why are there menial rats dressed in human clothes running around the compound?” Summer asked her expression a confused mix of awe and disgust.

“Just making sure I’m not the only one who’s crazy,” Glenna agreed.

“It seems we’re all mad here,” Grayson said, patting Glenna’s shoulder.

“Is this real?” I asked Wrythe.

“Very real.” His face grew serious and he studied each of us in turn as he spoke. “Look, I know you’ve been taught something completely different over the years and for the most part that information still holds true. Ninety-nine percent of all demons are evil and must be destroyed. But the first secret of the Dark Moth Society is that not everything is as it seems. Just as its been revealed that there are Dark Moths filled with corruption, you must also understand and therefore keep the secret that there are demons who want nothing more than to do good.” He paused, allowing us a moment to let that piece of news sink in.

I watched the menial rats scuttle by, anxiously engaged with their specific tasks and they did seem like different creatures… almost.

“As you can imagine,” Wrythe continued. “Demons who desire to do good are considered traitors and atrocities to their own kind. Many, if they are discovered, are tortured and killed in the most grewsome manner.”

At his words, I remembered all of the tortured demons on D13.

Someone or several someones within the Society felt it necessary to torture demons as well. “These,” he paused, indicating beyond the elevator doors, “are the demons who’ve rejected what they were born to be. In here, we’ve created a sanctuary for them. We teach them how to live and become productive members of our secret society.”

“Don’t you worry they will betray us?” I asked, unable to take my eyes off them.

“They’ve been rejected by demons and, if spotted, will be killed on sight by their own kind. Loyalty has never been an issue.” Wrythe stepped out of the elevator. Almost instantly, those menials who saw him stopped what they were doing and fell to their knees.

“Rise, little ones,” he said. “Better get back to work.” He smiled genuinely.

They did as he commanded as the remainder of us exited the elevator. I was the last one out and heard the doors hum closed.

“This way,” Wrythe said, moving down the hall.

I brought up the rear, unable to help staring at the demons. I kept expecting to see one of them doing something evil, but none of them did. In every direction, they were busy making clothes or cleaning. All of them doing something constructive. Strangest of all, they seemed happy.

Wrythe stopped us at a door.

I waited for him to tell us that the world was square instead of round and that we needed to keep that a secret as well, but he didn’t.

Instead he smiled. “The elevator access and your initiation with Dora was all the meeting we will do for tonight. Now’s the time for some fun,” he said, his smile growing until it filled his handsome face. “Tomorrow is a new day, one that will be occupied with choices and accountability, but for tonight, we get to relax and enjoy.” He pushed open the door and it was like walking into a circus. Color and music were everywhere.

Again, it felt like my eyes were deceiving me. A creature reminiscent of an orange house cat walked on two legs toward me. It wore a white dress and carried a tray full of sparkling drinks. “Care for a bubbly?” she asked, her voice a combination of growl and scratch.

“Sure,” I responded, automatically taking one.

Summer and Glenna were beside me, taking a glass from the tray as well.

“How you holding up,” Grayson asked, suddenly on the other side of me.

“Fine,” I lied. “You?”

“Damn super,” he said, his eyes roaming over everything.

The music changed to a loud and repeated thumping. Creatures I’d never seen before danced and swayed and laughed. There were acrobats, jugglers, elephants carrying other creatures, and creatures breathing fire. I couldn’t help but wonder whether I’d been drugged. Setting down the drink, I went in search of Wrythe. He was speaking with a group of menial demons.

“Wrythe,” I shouted over the music, keeping my distance.

He saw me and held up a finger, asking for another moment. Then went back to talking. I crossed my arms as my shock wore off and filtered into irritation and finally turned to anger. How could he be supporting demons? The longer I thought about it, the angrier I got until a red hue of light pulsed around me.

Wrythe said goodbye and came over. “Alice, get ahold of yourself. You don’t want anyone to see you.”

“I don’t give a damn whether anyone sees me. Do you think they’re going to care with all of this going on?” I waved an arm around the room, still stunned by all that was happening.

“You’re upset.” He crossed his arms. “I get that, but you have to understand there are two sides to every story. That’s what ruling means.” He watched me intently.

“How can you say that? We were literally created as a way to save our species. From them,” I shouted, motioning toward a mid-level demon serving drinks behind one of the bars.

“Not these demons, Alice,” he said, grabbing my arm and walking me over to a set of curtains. He pulled the thick, red drapes back to reveal a booth. It was occupied by an odd couple heavily making out. “Sorry, but I need you to leave,” he barked.

They were going to complain, but then noticed who he was. “Yes, sire,” the one said.

They looked to be half human and half fox.

“Thank you,” he said as they left. Then he helped me into the seat and closed the curtain. His jaws clenched together as though he was chewing on his anger. “You more than anyone should understand that not everything is as it seems. You’re half angel for crying out loud. Surely you can have a little compassion for those who’re different from us.”

I froze. “How did you know?” My mind raced at the knowledge.

“It’s my job to know everything that goes on within this compound and the sooner you understand that, the better,” he said. “Before Peter died, he said he believed that’s why you occasionally glow the silvery-white color. I didn’t want to believe it because I would never ask someone to go through that again, but it didn’t take much to recognize Peter was right.” He sighed heavily.

“Wait,” I began, knowing I was changing the subject, but I didn’t care. “You knew someone else who was half demon and half angel?” Hadn’t Dora said something to that effect in the elevator?

He ran his hands over his face, suddenly tired. “Yes, I’ve met another. Not quite like you. He wasn’t sired by the Devil, but a demon. His angel powers began to manifest around his eighteenth birthday, the same as yours did.” He leaned heavily on his arms, resting his elbows on the table.

I nodded. “Where is this Dark Moth? Can I meet him?”

“No,” Wrythe said. “He no longer exists.”

Something about the way he said it made me think he wasn’t being truthful. But I changed the subject again. “Why support demons? How many thousands of our kind are suffering—Moths who need our help—while we’re wasting our resources on… rats!”

“Who do you think makes the packs we give those Moths we help, Alice? The clothes. The socks. The mittens, coats, scarves, and shoes? Trust me when I say these demons are an asset to the Society. We couldn’t accomplish all we do without them.”

I sat back, flabbergasted. “You’re serious?”

“Yes, I’m dead serious. And when I’m gone, you’re going to have to take over for me.”

At his words, I suddenly felt sick. The bubbly I’d drunk and the food I’d eaten at dinner pressed against my throat. “I need a bathroom.”

“Why don’t you go to your rooms instead?” He stood and held out his hand.

I stared up at him, ignoring his request to send me away, though that was exactly what I wanted. “What are these creatures? Why are they here? And Dora? What is that thing?”

“They are the downtrodden and castaways. They are the abominations among their species and like us, they need someone to believe in them, to watch out for them and keep them safe.” His face softened, his eyes pleading with me to understand, but I couldn’t. I doubted I ever would. “Alice, they need us, and we need them. You must see that while this place it’s strange, it’s also beautiful.”

“I don’t know,” I admitted. “But I can’t be here another moment. I’m exhausted. So, if that’s all, I’m going to go to bed.”

He nodded. “Very well. I’ve had your new rooms prepared.” He motioned to someone and a woman appeared at his side. She was tiny, not even five feet tall, and beyond waifish. If a brisk wind caught her, she might blow away. “This is Styx. She’ll be happy to take you up.”

“My rooms? Where’s all my stuff?” I wasn’t thrilled by the prospect of someone going through my few personal belongings. What if they’d gone through my borrowed journal of the supernatural? What about my gun with the angel essence bullets? I had secrets I didn’t want revealed.

I had secrets! The realization dawned on me, and I took a step back as though smacked in the face. I was no different than Wrythe. “Did you know about the torture happening to demons on level thirteen?” The words were out before I could sensor them.

“What are you talking about?” He appeared genuinely confused. “D13 is our genetics testing lab, but all that goes on down there is testing of our own kind. I’ve authorized a team to find the gene that separates the Moths from the Dark Moths. My hope is to give them a serum that will allow every Moth the opportunity to defend themselves. The breakthrough could save a lot of lives. The only test subjects down there are Moths who’ve agreed to have their blood used and the serums tested.”

I shook my head, unsure whether he was lying or if he’d been deceived the same as the rest of us. “That may be what you thought was happening down there, but I can personally testify to the fact that your team was torturing demons. And not just some little prick of a finger.” I shuddered at the memory. “They were tortured to the point of death but kept alive, so they wouldn’t turn to dust. Their suffering… was despicable, a disgrace to the Dark Moth Society.”

“I haven’t been down there in quite some time, but I’ll look into it. If what you say is true, the perpetrators will be tried, convicted, and either banished or killed according to our laws. I promise there should’ve been none of that.” It was obvious he was innocent and had no inclination about what had been going on down there. Unless he’d told his team not to tell him what they were doing. That would give him plausible deniability. “I swear to you, Alice. I will get to the bottom of it.”

A wave of exhaustion washed over me. I didn’t even have the energy to tell him that whole level had been wiped clean and no evidence remained to back up my claims. He would either believe me or not. “Thanks,” was all I said as the Moth named Styx indicated I should follow her.

“Goodnight,” I said, passing Wrythe.

“Night.” He didn’t say another word and I was grateful. I needed time to discover how I really felt about the situation I now found myself in.

I followed Styx through the crowd toward a door on the opposite wall we’d entered through. For years, I’d believed there was only one way in and out of Demonland. Turned out that wasn’t even close to the truth.

Another secret, I thought.

At the elevator, Styx pressed a button before stepping back to stand beside me. “Hello, Alice. I’m Styx. It’s an honor to be of service to you.”

“Thanks,” I responded, distracted. The remainder of the Dark Moths were clumped together laughing and talking.

Always an outcast, I thought mournfully.

The doors opened. “After you,” she said, signifying I should get in.

I crossed my arms. “Lead the way.”

She entered first and I followed. Styx pressed a button. It didn’t escape my notice that unlike the main elevator, there was a T next to the numbers on this keypad.

“What does the T stand for?” I asked as the elevator moved.

“Towers,” Styx said, her bobbed blond hair moving as she spoke. I was about to ask what exactly that meant when she went on. “It’s a little difficult to explain until you’ve seen it. We’re going to the top now, so you can take a look.”

I gulped but didn’t speak. Tonight was full of secrets and I was a little nervous about what I would see. How could there be towers underground? And how big was Demonland, exactly? I always thought it was just the compound.

The elevator stopped. The doors slid open. And for the third or fourth time that night, my mouth fell open. We were in an enormous cavern. In my limited vision I could see something, but I wasn't sure what. It looked like an island covered in all manner of trees, flowers, and greenery, except at the very center, there sat a rectangle box made from what, I wasn't sure. Through the center of the box was a metal pole that went all the way to the ceiling.

"Now then," Styx said, stepping out. "We are at the top of Tower one. Come have a look."

I stepped out onto a grated walkway and stopped beside Styx, resting my hands on the metal railing. I glanced over the edge and felt dizzy. The chasm below kept going until there was nothing to see.

"What do you think?" she asked.

I glanced at her, swallowing back the bile rising in my throat. To take my mind off it, I studied Styx.

"What exactly is this?"

"Tower one," she said pointing, and clearly confused by my question.

"Yes, I get that, but what is it?" I tried again.

"Each island is a council member's residence," someone said from behind me. I jumped. I hadn't expected anyone else to be here.

He sidled up beside me and I caught the glint of something metallic in his hand. At his nearness, a feeling I couldn't explain came over me. I bent over, pulling my knife from my boot, wishing I had my gun. "What do you want?" I asked, pointing the knife at him.

In answer, he brandished his gun. He was obviously a Dark Moth, sired by a Sloth demon according to the tattoos on his hands. Tall like the rest of the males, he seemed familiar. I realized after the flash of a moment it was Seth Rutherford, the man who'd interrupted earlier today. “Hello, Alice,” he said. “I’ve been dying to meet you.” He pointed the gun at me.

Without thinking, I dove at him, slashing his gun-toting arm. His eyes flashed with excitement. “It’s true what they say about you then.” He held the gun up and I snatched it from him.

“I don’t care what they say about me,” I responded, turning his own gun on him.

“What are you doing down here?” Styx asked, her voice raised an octave.

“Don’t you dare speak to me, mutt,” he said, his words lashing at her like a whip. Styx huddled behind me.

“Her question is valid. What are you doing here?” I found my center, knowing if I had to, I would stop Seth permanently. At the thought, angry red glittered off my skin.

Seth’s eyes got wide. “Amazing,” he said and for the briefest moment he reminded me of Pasty. He had the same look on his face, as though he wanted to collect me and take me apart, so he could see what my insides were made of. “I told you. I wanted to meet you. When I am king, it’ll be good to know who my enemies are and what you’re capable of… unless you can be persuaded to be on my side?”

“You can be certain that will never happen,” I said, moving toward him.

“You say that now, but there are things about Wrythe you don’t know. If you did, I think you might feel differently about him.” He eyed me curiously. “Or not. It’s difficult to read you, especially with that beautiful red glittering around your body.” As he spoke, he took me in, until I began to feel uncomfortable.

“Wrythe can decide what to do with you himself,” I said, coming forward to take his wrist. But before I could make contact, he sidestepped me and took off running.

I went after him, my boots clanking on the metal grate under my feet.

Seth spoke, but sounded very far away. “I may have been banished, but that doesn’t mean I can’t still go wherever I want to go within Demonland.”

I whirled back around, standing beside Styx. “Did you see him?”

She shook her head, mouthing the word no.

Seth’s voice seemed to emanate from the walls around me. “All of Demonland’s secrets have been revealed to me. I even know a secret about your king and it’s a doozy.”

“Where are you?” I shouted, running around the elevator again until I was back to Styx.

“Everywhere and nowhere,” he said. “Until me meet again, Alice Blackburn.”

I felt his presence leave the catwalk. “Hey, wait,” I shouted.

“Where did he go?” Styx asked, hugging herself, fear plastered across her features. “He’s evil, that one.”

“We should tell Wrythe,” I said.

“I will, as soon as I get you settled, Alice.”

But I realized after Seth had appeared during the ceremony earlier, Wrythe hadn’t had anyone go after him. He hadn’t even mentioned the Dark Moth. That was strange because I figured he would use all his considerable resources to find Seth.

“Come on,” Styx said, waving me back into the elevator. “Let’s get you to your rooms.”

“All right.” I followed her, tucking my knife back in my boot and waiting quietly until the elevator stopped again. I had a multitude of questions, but my nerves were shot, and I thought if I opened my mouth at that moment, I would scream and be unable to stop. So I gritted my teeth and held on until the doors to the elevators opened again.

“Right this way,” Styx said.

I followed, taking a tentative step forward. Instead of my boots striking a metal walkway, they landed on the greenest grass I've ever seen. "Is this real?" I bent to feel it and the soft blades brushed against the palm of my hand. "How is this possible?"

"Magic," Styx said.

The scent of lemons and fragrant flowers filled the air. I breathed in deeply, and some of my stress faded away. Birds fluttered from tree to tree. A bramble of rose bushes lined the garden and grew up and over my head in a dome shape. The bushes served as a barrier to the empty darkness that I knew was out there, beyond the roses, but that I couldn't see. Thankfully! Lemon and cherry trees grew around the rectangular box I figured housed my rooms. One of the birds flew in front of me and turned. And she wasn't a bird at all, but a humanish creature with large wings.

"What are you?" I asked.

She put her hands on her hips, shaking her face at me. "I am a pixilette," she said in a high voice. "My name is Daya." Her blue wings fluttered behind her.

"Daya, it's lovely to meet you. Do you take care of this garden?" I was so beyond freaked out by all I'd seen since becoming a council member that the cute pixilette didn't even phase me.

"Myself and my family care for it," she said, flourishing a hand. I realized that the garden wasn't filled with birds as I'd first believed, but a dozen or so pixilettes, all with different colors of wings.

"Well, thank you, Daya. This garden is beautiful."

Her skin turned a light shade of pink. "It's our pleasure, Alice." She flew away.

"Right through here," Styx said, opening the large wooden door.

I went in, stopping just inside. "But, why have I been put out here?" Almost like I'd been banished, the same as Seth. Peter and Wrythe both had rooms in the main compound as did many of the other teachers. Before that moment, I'd believed all the teachers and society members did. But as I thought about it I realized that would be impossible. I'd walked all of the hallways and there weren't nearly as many rooms as there were trainees and Dark Moths.

"Some of the teachers have a smaller room within the compound as will you, but these quarters have been prepared for you for when you need a break from everything else."

"Oh," I said, surprised by the luxury. "I don't need all of this. The room I had was fine."

Styx smiled, obviously trying to placate me. "You feel that way now, but how will you feel after you've been doing your job for six months or a year? Constant questions. Problems to solve. Choices to make. I have a feeling you'll be grateful for these rooms before too long." She tucked some hair behind her ear nervously. "Let me at least show you around," she said, and I could tell she was already weary of me.

I couldn't blame her, though I refused to apologize. "Thank you, Styx." I walked into a luxurious great room complete with a sitting area, dining table, and kitchen. "Holy wow! This seems like too much."

"No, it isn't. It's perfect." She led me through the rooms decorated in black and gold with accents of white to the enormous bedroom complete with a king-sized bed, a reading area, a walk-in closet, and a master bathroom. Within was a shower, and a separate claw-foot tub as well as two sinks and the toilet. "Why would I ever need two sinks?" This felt wasteful and excessive.

"Company," she answered simply. That single word filled me with mortification because I knew what she was implying.

I walked back out to the great room. "Where's my stuff?" I asked.

She led me back into the walk-in closet. I hadn't really studied the interior the first time, but now I took it all in. There were a dozen uniforms and boots as well as dresses and matching heels. Drawers were filled with socks and under things. Underneath was a box and in it were my journal, gun, and a few other items. I sighed with relief, picking up the box and setting it at the foot of my bed before going back into the great room.

“Found it. Thank you, Styx.” I stifled a yawn. “I think I’m going to bed. Thanks for everything.”

She bowed. “I’m yours, madam. Whatever you need, please don’t hesitate to ask. Just press this button.” She indicated a button next to the door.

“Hmmm. What do you mean mine?” I didn’t like the sound of that.

“Whether you need help dressing, a make-up artist, a hairstylist, an assistant, or whatever, I’m available to you twenty-four hours a day.”

“That isn’t necessary. I can dress myself.” I didn’t want someone feeling beholden to me.

Tears filled her eyes and her bottom lip pushed out before she began to cry.

“I’m sure Wrythe can find another place for you to work,” I said, falling onto a chair, too tired to continue standing while we argued.

She shook her head, wiping her eyes. “Wrythe told me that if I couldn’t convince you to keep me then I was to leave the compound and never return.”

“What? That’s ridiculous,” I said, sitting up.

“He knew you would turn down any help, but I told him I could convince you. I know what you are, and I can help.” She knelt in front of me and began unlacing my boots.

“Stop that.” I stood, walking away from her.

“Please. I beg you. Don’t make me leave the compound. I-I can’t survive on my own.” Tears fell from her cheeks in droves.

“I— Fine.” I went over to the bed and bent over to remove my boots. I wasn’t in the mood to fight her or Wrythe or anyone else. I needed sleep.

Styx jumped up, her curly hair bouncing as she moved. “Thank you, Alice.” She bent in front of me.

“No,” I said. “You can stay. You’re my assistant or whatever, but I don’t need your help,” I barked.

Her face fell and her bottom lip trembled again.

“I just mean tonight,” I said, my voice softening. “I don’t need anything more from you tonight, Styx. Except that you tell Wrythe about Seth.” If he wasn’t going to be concerned about the man then neither was I.

“I’m going now,” she said with a salute. “Goodnight, then.” She bowed, and left, quiet as a mouse, closing the door behind her. I triple locked it before getting out of my clothes and taking a shower. I felt dirty for some reason and needed to wash all I’d seen off me.

When I’d dressed in silk shorts (my only option as they’d thrown my favorite albeit well-worn clothes away) and camisole before climbing into the giant bed. The sheets were gold and so soft I felt as though I was lying on cool water. I put my hands behind my head and studied the ceiling. It was then I remembered my spider. I suddenly missed her as loneliness seeped through my skin. It was in the moments just before I fell asleep that it occurred to me what Styx had said. She knew what I was!

Did she really? I would question her tomorrow morning… if it mattered. Everyone in the compound probably knew about my half angel status. Now if only someone could tell me what that status meant.

OceanofPDF.com

SLEEP WAS FILLED with horrible dreams about menial demons dressed in human clothes attacking me, their sharp teeth slashing away my flesh, skin dangling from bloodied mouths.

"Alice," one of them said. Something seemed familiar about it. Perhaps it was the green of its eyes.

"Wake up, Alice. I need to talk to you," it continued. "Alice!" It screamed, showering bloodied spittle all over my face.

I woke at the same time I pulled my knife from under my pillow and held it at Kade's throat.

He swallowed, his eyes twin emerald pools of worry.

"How do you keep finding me?" It was a question he answered before, but one I needed to ask again.

"Why don't you put down the knife and we'll talk?" His hand covered mine, filling me with warmth. I hungered for him, like a starving animal. I needed him.

"Fine." As I tucked the knife back under my pillow, my fingers brushed against the demon orb. On instinct, I fisted it, knowing whatever happened, I needed to keep it nearby. I sat up.

Kade leaned back, his lips twitching as though they were desperate to smile but couldn't. "You know I can always find you," he said, crossing his arms.

"It does seem that way, but why?" I kept my voice quiet, desperate to slow the rapid beating of my heart.

"As I've said before, we're bound together, you and me. Where you go, I go." He leaned over me again and I sucked in my breath, desperate for his touch, drugged by the scent of him.

I wanted to ask why we were bound, but that wasn't what came out. "Kiss me," I commanded softly.

He moved so until we were close, our noses touching. Then he pressed a soft kiss to my lips. “He’ll come for me soon and I need to talk to you before that happens.”

I sucked in a breath, confused. “Who will come for you?”

He eyed me, his gaze telling me I should know.

And I suddenly did. Kade was talking about the Devil. The time for my second Trial had run out. “But it isn’t time yet,” I said, flatly.

“After so many years in contact with him, I know.” He brushed his thumb across my cheek, sending a wave of desire over my skin.

“Can’t you resist him or something? You’re an angel, he’s a demon. Isn’t your light more powerful than his darkness?”

He shook his head. “Not even close,” he said, and I could tell it pained him to admit that. “But there is something I need to say to you.”

“What is it?” I took his hands in mine, forcing away my need to scream.

“When the time comes, Alice, I want you to choose for me to die,” he said.

I wasn’t ready to have this conversation with him. “No, Kade. You can’t ask me to do that.” I pulled away, going over to my bed and getting under the covers. Surely they would offer some protection.

“You must.” He bent down, kissing me passionately, his lips bruising mine. I love you, Alice, he spoke into my mind. And then he was gone. Tears fell from my cheeks and dripped into my ears. “Kade,” I whispered. “I love you, too.”

I curled into a ball, determined to lie there in brooding suffrage for the rest of forever. In that moment, I’d given up hope. Life wasn’t fair. In fact, it sucked rocks!

My phone rang.

I ignored it, letting it go to voice mail.

Then it rang again.

Again, I ignored it.

By the third time, I was ready to huck the damn thing in the toilet. I went to my dresser, turning my phone over so I could see who was bothering me.

It was Joannie, the woman I'd met at Monument Valley. She was coocoo, but she was also sort of a new friend and obviously in need of something. "Hello?" I said, answering the call.

"A-Alice, is that you?" It sounded like she'd been crying.

"Yes. Is everything all right?"

"I…Alice, I've been having these dreams since we visited the cave. And I can't really make sense of them. Can you meet me at the entrance to Monument Valley? I need to talk."

"Well." I didn't want to do anything except continue to sulk, but she was so upset. I couldn't let her suffer on her own. I guessed she didn't have anyone else since she was calling me. "I'll be there as soon as I can," I said.

"Thank you, Alice."

"Sure." I had no idea how I would get there unless I spoke to Heathcliff. "I'm going to bring that doctor friend I was telling you about. Is that okay?"

"That's fine. See you soon." She hung up.

I got ready and then headed over to Heathcliff's office. After a quick knock, I entered. Per the usual, Doc was seated at his desk, peering into his microscope. "Hey, Doc. Are you busy?"

"Always, but what's up?" He spun away from his desk to face me.

I studied all the things on his workstation, including more of the bullets in totes that I guessed had been dipped in angel essence. What stood out was the tote filled with ladybugs. There was no lid on it and I wondered why they didn't fly away.

"Alice?" he asked, bringing me out of my thoughts.

"Right, sorry. I came to ask… See, I have this friend. Her name is Joannie and she's having a hard time distinguishing the difference between dreams and reality. I'm worried about her and hoped maybe you could help me help her?"

"I'd be glad to help. Where is she?"

"Monument Valley," I said, hoping he knew how to get there and beyond relieved he was so willing to help.

"Oh, okay. We'll need to go by portal," he began. "When are we supposed to meet her?"

"Right now," I said, feeling sheepish.

"No problem." He stood and went over to his desk drawer before removing his lab coat and grabbing his medical bag. "You ready?"

"Seriously?" I hadn't expected him to drop everything like that. It was probably because I was so emotional over what'd just happened with Kade, but tears pressed against the backs of my eyes at his willingness. "Thank you." I cleared my throat. "I'm ready."

"Anytime, Alice," he said, moving toward a back room. "In here. It's better if we go through the portal in private."

"Makes sense." I followed him into the room and he closed the door. Then he threw something into the air and millions of twinkling lights exploded around a dark hole. "After you, my dear."

It was the same as when I'd gone in with Professor Pops and Kenmei, only that time we'd taken the portal into the parking garage above Demonland. "Thanks," I said, stepping forward into the darkness. When I came out the other end, I recognized that we were in Monument Valley. It was the views. It occurred to me there was no other place on earth as beautiful as the wide-open skies here.

Heathcliff appeared right after me. "Where to?" he asked.

"This way." I led him out from behind the trees, past the hotel and toward the entrance. Joannie was there, her arms crossed as she paced nervously, her gaze on the ground in front of her. There were others milling about, some giving Joannie nervous glances. I spotted Toby before checking out the three guides. Were they angels too? I had a thought. Toby, can you hear me? Toby. It's me, Alice. Can you hear me?

The man didn't even look in my direction. Obviously, the speaking into each other's minds thing wasn't normal between angels, just something special between Kade and I.

At the thought of Kade, my heart broke. Where had the Devil taken him? And why? Why so soon? I wanted to get angry, and felt the rage burn. But as the red glow began to permeate my skin, I took a deep breath. It wouldn't do to let strangers see me sparkling like a ruby gem.

"Alice," Joannie called upon seeing me. "It's so good to see you," she said, giving me a hug.

I hugged her back and then introduced her to Heathcliff. "This is the doctor I was telling you about—Heathcliff Henry."

Heathcliff came forward. "Hello, Joannie. It's nice to meet you."

"You too," she said shyly, her eyes taking him in. Then her nervous gaze fell on me. "You're really here, right? This is real?"

I pinched her lightly on the arm. "It's real," I said, reassuring her.

She rubbed the part of her arm I pinched. "Good. Thanks."

Heathcliff gave me a look that said I was right to have called him. But there was something else too. Almost like recognition. "Why don't you come with me? We'll get you someplace safe."

She studied him hesitantly. "Alice?"

I put an arm around her shoulders, hoping to ease her worry. "I've known this man more than seven years. He's good and kind and if anyone can help you figure out what's going on, it's him."

She hesitated a moment, thinking it through. "All right. Where are we going?"

"This way," he said, walking quickly back the way we'd come.

I went after him, but Toby said my name and I stopped, glancing back at him. Joannie stopped too. "Go on without me. I'm going to talk to Toby and then I'll be right behind you."

"Okay." She seemed unsure.

"I promise, I'll be right behind you." I waved her on in the direction Heathcliff had gone.

She nodded once and took off at a jog after the Doc. "Wait up," she called.

I turned in Toby's direction just as he ran over. "What's going on with Joannie? She's been here every day for the last two weeks. I spoke with the other guides. They've all seen her as well. Sometimes she just talks to herself. Other times, she seems perfectly lucid. At least that's what the guys said." He indicated the guides behind him.

"Heathcliff is a doctor. We're going to try to help her out. Thanks for checking though."

"Sure. Of course." He put his hands on his hips. "What about you? How are you?"

"I've been better," I said, giving him a wan smile. "But I can't discuss it now. They're waiting for me."

"All right." He patted me on the back. "I hope to see you again soon, Alice Blackburn."

"I'm sure you will," I responded, though part of me wasn't sure. Without Kade I didn't feel like myself. I wondered if I'd ever want to see another angel as long as I lived.

Toby jogged back to his perch in the front of the readying tourists.

I hurried over to where I was sure Heathcliff had led Joannie. Sure enough, I saw him there, but something was wrong. Joannie was on the ground with Heathcliff hovering over her. "Doc. Hey," I yelled, picking up speed until I reached him and slid to a stop. "What's wrong with her?"

"Nothing. I just gave her a sleeping draught. No sense freaking her out even more when we go through another portal." He closed his bag and stood. "Can you carry her? I need to open the portal."

“Yep.” I stooped low and lifted her. She was light as a feather and easy to maneuver.

Heathcliff opened the portal and stepped in. I followed after, expecting to arrive back in his office, but that wasn’t where we were. The room looked and even smelled familiar. It was the room I’d stayed in with Professor Pops. My heart leaped with joy, excited to see the old vampire.

“Put her on the bed,” Heathcliff said. “She’ll be out at least an hour and I want to speak with Professor Pops before she wakes. I want to get some advice.”

I did as he asked, tucking a blanket carefully over her. It wasn’t cold, but blankets always brought me comfort. It was the weight of them. I figured Joannie might feel the same.

“Want to come down and say hello?” Heathcliff left his bag next to the door before opening it.

“I think I’d better stay here with Joannie, just in case she wakes before you get back. I don’t want her to be even more confused than she already is.”

“Sure.” He studied me intently. “You’re a good friend, Alice.”

I didn’t know what to say to that.

“I’ll be back as soon as I can.”

“I’ll be here,” I returned, walking over to the window peeking out over Professor Pops’ expansive land.

Grateful for the time alone, I thought about all that had happened in the last twenty-four hours. It almost didn’t feel real and a part of me totally understood where Joannie was coming from. I still couldn’t believe Wrythe provided a sanctuary and employed demons! Sure, they were supposedly “good” demons… I’d seen them working, their disgusting rat bodies covered in clothing as they bustled about. But I couldn’t believe it. And then there was Styx and my oasis, complete with a garden and a full luxury suite of rooms. How had that become my life? Not to mention my angel status. My mother had been an angel of death—an archangel—and yet she'd somehow decided to make a baby with the Devil. Beyond that was a prophecy I was supposed to be a part of.

I also pondered over what had happened between Wrythe and me. Why I'd seen a future with him, but not with Kade. Was I supposed to choose my head or my heart? The Devil… my father had said that. As much as I didn't like it, I could see what he meant. In every way, Wrythe and I belonged together and when we kissed I felt desire for him. But he wasn't Kade.

"Alice?"

My shoulders rose as anxiety riddled my body. What would Joannie think happened to her? I took a cleansing breath before facing her. "Hey, Joannie. How'd you sleep?"

She sat up, rubbing her hands along her arms. "Fine, I guess." She scanned the room, taking in our surroundings. "I don't remember falling asleep."

"No worries. Heathcliff and I brought you to his home. He'll be back to examine you in just a few minutes." I hoped that was true. I didn't know how long I'd stood at the window, debating the unjustness of my life. "Are you feeling okay? Cold? Hungry? Can I get you something to eat?"

"Some water might be nice."

"You got it." I went to the door. "I'll be right back. Don't move," I said.

"I'll be here." She climbed out of bed and I decided just to hurry.

I ran down the stairs and into the kitchen where I opened the fridge to retrieve a water bottle. Professor Pops and Heathcliff were seated at the bar, talking. "She's awake," I said, heading back up.

"We'll be right there," Heathcliff responded behind me.

When I reached the bedroom, I opened the door. Joannie was standing at exactly the same place I'd been only moments before. She had her arms crossed, her body turned slightly so I knew she could see me and still study what was happening beyond the window.

"Here you go," I said, bringing it to her.

"Thanks." She opened the bottle and took a sip. "This place seems really nice. The doctor must do well for himself."

"Well, it technically isn't his house, it's—"

While I'd been speaking, I heard Heathcliff and Professor Pops come in. Joannie turned away from the window and peered over my shoulder. Her gaze met Professor Pops' and a tremor visibly shook her body. She dropped the water bottle and her eyes grew wide. "Adam," she said, covering her mouth with both hands.

"How do you know Professor Pops?" I asked, moving out of the way of what was obviously a moment between the two of them.

Professor Pops was usually easy-going and nonchalant, but now he stood gaping at her like he'd seen a ghost. "Red," he whispered. "I've been worried sick over you."

"She's been missing a few weeks," Heathcliff said, filling me in.

I was confused. "You know her?"

"Yes," Heathcliff whispered.

Professor Pops and Joannie crossed the room toward each other as though they were two ends of a magnet. I didn't understand what was happening. How did Joannie know Professor Pops?

The two of them stopped just out of reach of each other. Professor Pops lifted his hands as though desperate to touch her, but he couldn't quite bring himself to do it. "You disappeared," he whispered, his voice hoarse. "And I thought I lost you again."

"I did," Joannie admitted. Her entire aspect had changed at the sight of him. She no longer seemed crazy or confused, but I couldn't help thinking the two of them were batty. What they were saying was impossible. Heathcliff told me Professor Pops had fallen in love with Joan of Arc, but that woman died nearly six hundred years ago.

Joannie couldn't be the same person. It was impossible.

"Where were you?" Professor Pops' fingertips brushed her face. Gentle, oh, so gentle. Then he kissed her, and the intimacy between them made me feel like a stalker.

Moving quietly, I went over to Heathcliff. "Should we give them a few moments alone?"

Heathcliff eyes danced between them and his expression seemed angry. Stomping forward, he shoved Professor Pops and Joannie apart and took a protective stance in front of Professor Pops, facing Joannie. "I don't know what the hell you're playing at, but you'd better stay away from my dad." He was breathing heavily, and in that moment, I didn't see a respected doctor but a child afraid someone was going to hurt his father.

Professor Pops smiled at him, placing a calming hand on Heathcliff's shoulder. "It's okay, Heath. Son, she really is my Red."

Heathcliff wasn't buying it. "She took off. Again. Who's to say she won't do it again." He glared at Joannie. "Explain yourself, vampire."

Vampire? That was interesting. She hadn't tried to drink my blood. But then Kenmei and Professor Pops hadn't either.

Joannie laughed. "I don't know what happened to me. One minute I was here with Adam and the next I couldn't remember anything about my life and I kept having these strange dreams or visions—like before." Her gaze bounced between Pops and Heathcliff pleading with them to believe her.

I did.

Heathcliff's face went white as a sheet. "Why?"

I decided to see if I could help. "Joannie," I said, taking a tentative step toward them. When she saw me, her eyes went wide.

"I would recognize you anywhere," she said and wrapped me in a tight hug.

I was confused. Who did she believe me to be? "Joannie, it's me, Alice. We met at Monument Valley.” I hugged her back, wondering if she’d totally lost her mind.

“I know exactly who you are,” she said, and I could swear she sniffed me.

I gently pushed her off. “You do? Are you sure?”

OceanofPDF.com

I HELD ONTO HER, positive her head had cracked open and all the crazy was flying out. “What should I do?” I mouthed to Heathcliff who was looking at Professor Pops.

The Doc sprang into action, clearly still wary of this bizarre woman we’d brought into his dad’s home. “Joannie, why don’t you come over to the couch and have a seat?” He took her by the shoulders, gently pulling her from me.

“Sure,” she said, reaching for Professor Pops’ hand and tugging him along with her.

A quick glance at the professor revealed his former certainty had transformed into worry. Was this what had him worried the other day? It was obvious Joannie looked exactly like Joan of Arc, the woman he’d fallen deeply in love with in the fourteen hundreds, before he became a vampire and she went off to defend her country.

At a loss as to what I should do I followed after them, taking the lone chair off to the side of the couch Joannie and Professor Pops sat in. Heathcliff perched on the coffee table in front of them, his stethoscope out.

He approached his new patient cautiously, looking as if he expected her to attack him any second. “I need to listen to your heart, if you don’t mind.”

Joannie smiled, scooting in closer to Professor Pops. “I’m fine now, really. I remember everything.” She looked at Professor Pops. “Adam, I’m so sorry I ran off. There is much I must tell you,” she said, her eyes soft as she studied him.

“I’m willing to listen, my love,” Pops said.

Joannie looked at Heathcliff. “I’m okay now, but perhaps you can discover why I couldn’t remember her.” She eyed me.

I sat up. “What do you mean, Joannie?” There was something strange going on. I wasn’t sure what, but I knew the answer would change my life forever.

Joannie’s eyes softened as she regarded me. “You are even more beautiful than I thought you’d be,” she said, not answering my question.

I sat back. Maybe she wasn’t as lucid as she seemed. “I haven’t changed all that much since the last time you saw me.” My heart had been ripped from my chest at the loss of Kade, but otherwise I was pretty much the same.

She shook her head. “The last time I saw you, mon petite, you were tiny, so small I thought I might break you.”

My emotions ran the gambit at those words. What was she saying? She’d seen me as a baby? Did that mean she’d taken care of me after my mom died, or…” I froze, my gaze catching hold of hers.

She nodded as though she knew what I was thinking. “That’s right, Alice. I’m your mother.”

I thought my heart might beat out of my chest. “That’s impossible,” I said, fanning my face, wishing I could talk to Kade. Kade! I shouted into my mind. Kade, I need you. Please. Kade!

And then I understood why the Devil had taken him early. He knew what I would face today, and he wanted me to do it alone. The bastard!

Heathcliff was going through his medical bag like he could find something in there that would make everything go back to normal.

Professor Pops was the only one who seemed unruffled. “Why don’t you tell Alice your story and then fill in the gaps with what you need to tell me about your having a daughter.” His calm was a façade and he wanted answers as much as I did.

She swallowed and nodded, folding her hands neatly in her lap. “Where would you like me to begin?”

“How about the day you died?” His eyes narrowed, and I felt the air shift around him. I knew Professor Pops could be intimidating, but the way he turned on Joannie was down-right deadly. There was no question he was the most dangerous being in the room.

“The day of my death was May thirtieth, fourteen hundred and thirty-one. It had rained, making the square muddy. The stench of town filled—”

“Stop.” Professor Pops leaned in, somehow menacing and serene at the same time. “What happened after you died?” His fingers brushed against her arm, caressing.

She blinked innocently up at him. “For years, I went through life as a revenant.” She looked at me. “That dear, is someone not quite human and not quite vampire.”

“Okay.” I didn’t know what else to say.

“One day I met a woman and we became fast friends. After a decade together, she tricked me into drinking some of my true love’s blood.” She swallowed as anger and sadness crossed her features. “Then I became a vampire.” She shook her head. “After that, I did horrible things, including killing several innocent humans for their blood.”

She didn’t look strong enough to kill anything, but vampires were different than humans, though they looked the same.

“Around that time, I was taken by the chayot and about to be put to death, but when I met Raphael, an archangel, he didn’t kill me. Instead he thanked me for my service and leadership in serving the army. He said I fought valiantly, and that what happened to me wasn’t my fault. He promised that my time of rest would begin, saying I’d earned it.” She shook her head, making a face. “But you know how I am, Adam. I spent one full day walking in a meadow filled with sunflowers and was done. I needed to do something.”

Professor Pops nodded. “I know, my love.”

I glanced at Heathcliff who’d moved away from the coffee table and sat quietly in the chair next to me, his hands in his lap. Worry etched within his features.

Joannie continued, “I called for Raphael and asked him to put me to work. It took a long time to convince him, but eventually he allowed me to work in the angel school as a teacher. After a several years, I went to him again, telling him I needed to be doing more—that surely the human race still needed me. He agreed to talk to his superiors. I waited another decade before he finally returned stating that if I wanted, I could become an angel of death. That my job would be to help those passing from mortality. I accepted readily. For many years, I loved my job and served those who died well. Until one day I met a man…” Her voice trailed off.

I leaned forward, interested despite myself.

“He wasn’t like any other being I’d ever met. He explained who he was and what he wanted from me.” She shook her head. “At first I blatantly refused. He was the father of all demons. Surely, an angel and a demon couldn’t be together. We spoke off and on for several years until I finally began to understand.”

I was on the edge of my chair.

“You and the Devil?” Professor Pops said, his face unreadable.

I had to agree. What would’ve possessed her to do such a thing?

“Dearest, I knew you and I could never be together as I was. It is forbidden for a vampire and an angel—”

Professor Pops stood abruptly. “But an angel and the Devil were perfectly acceptable?”

“No,” she whispered, swallowing. Tears glistened in her eyes and my heart ached at the pain reflected in them. “But just as I received revelation to help my country against our enemies while I was on earth, I began to receive it again. It was as though God himself commanded me to do this thing. How could I refuse?”

Professor Pops didn’t look convinced. “So you and the Devil were together?” The words came out desperate, as though an elephant sat on his chest.

"Mon amour, it meant nothing. I did what I thought was right." Her eyes went dark. "Nine months, I carried you," she said, studying me. "Nine of the happiest months of my life. The angels couldn't decide what to do with me, so finally Raphael sent me to earth where I lived in an apartment, got a job, and created a life for myself. I didn't know what would happen to me once you were born, but I was determined to make the best of our lives together." She gave me a watery smile which I returned.

This woman was my mom! I could feel it just as surely as I could feel my own heart beating in my chest.

"Once you were born, it was like a curtain had been pulled over my eyes. I woke one morning in an apartment I didn't recognize, with pictures of a life I didn't remember on my fridge, and a job I didn't recall ever going to. The doctors called it an erratic amnesia episode. Several psychologists said I'd had a psychotic break. My memories had simply vanished. There were pictures of me huge with pregnancy, but when I tried to figure out what had happened to you, there was nothing. I even hired a private investigator, but it was all to no avail. I tried everything the doctors suggested to recall my life before the episode, but never received a glimpse.

"Then my friends from the League of Huntsmen found me and told me I was a vampire still. I returned to my life's work as the memories flooded back—except for the time I spent with the Devil and then carrying and having you." She indicated me.

"Mom," I whispered.

She covered her mouth as her emotions got the better of her.

Then I found you again," she said looking up at Pops and I figured the holes in my memory meant nothing and I was so very happy." She held out her hand.

Pops took it. "Red," he said softly.

Joannie wiped her eyes. "A few months ago, I started to receive the visions again." She paused, and Pops encouraged her on with a nod. "I kept feeling I needed to be in Monument Valley, which is why I went there every day. But the more I was there, the more I felt like I might remember something important. I didn't understand why until the day I met you and we went into that cavern. That night, my first memory of you resurfaced." Her voice trailed off as if she struggled to find the words. "Even though you were just a baby the last time I saw you, I knew who you were." She shook her head. "You must've felt so alone," she said, tears falling from her eyes. She covered her face with her hands and sobbed. "I'm so sorry, Alice."

Professor Pops, who stood during her story, now returned to his seat beside Joannie. He was still perplexed, but not like he had been a few moments before. "There are no more holes in your memory?" he asked.

She shook her head, meeting his eyes. "I would have told you my love. But I'm here now and if you can forgive me." She paused glancing at her hands. "It's always only been you, Adam."

"But what about the angels and their rules?" Pops asked.

She shrugged. "I'm mostly a vampire, same as you, though I still work with some angels in the League. But the angel rules don't apply any longer." Hope brimmed in her eyes as they met his.

He took her hands. "I'm never letting you out of my sight again." He kissed her soundly.

Heathcliff and I exchanged embarrassed looks. I stood, thinking to leave, but Joannie came over to me before I even realized she'd stopped kissing Professor Pops.

"Alice. My sweet Alice. Can you forgive me for abandoning you?"

"I—" I cleared my throat. "I mean there's nothing to forgive," I said, still trying to wrap my brain around the fact that I was standing in front of my mom. It shouldn't have been possible.

She hugged me again.

And I returned it.

“You’re much too skinny,” she said taking in my appearance. “Let’s get you something to eat.”

Heathcliff laughed. “I guess everything is fine?” He looked at Pops for confirmation.

Professor Pops clapped his son on the back. “Thank you for bringing her here. Yet again, your instincts were spot on.”

“Anytime,” he said. “But I’d better get back to the compound. I didn’t tell anyone I was leaving, and they might be worried.”

“Right. Do you still have enough ingredients to get you there and back again?”

Heathcliff rolled his eyes. “Yes, Dad. I’m good.”

“Alright. Just checking. It’s my job to worry, even if you are a grown man.” He brought Heathcliff into a tight hug.

“Thanks,” he said, his voice muffled by the fact that his dad was hugging him so thoroughly. Then he released him and followed Joannie out of the room, but I stayed beside Heathcliff.

“Alice,” Joannie called. “You coming?”

I shook my head. “You have no idea how much I want to stay and sit at the counter while we talk some more, but I really need to get back to the compound too.”

Joannie shook her head. “No,” she said. “Please. Not yet. I just got you back.”

I didn’t want to hurt her feelings and I didn’t want to go, but I had responsibilities. “The only way for me to return home is through the portal Heathcliff can make. Otherwise, I’m about three thousand miles away from the compound and I’ve recently been made a member of the Dark Moth Society, plus…” I let my voice die in my throat. I didn’t want to tell her about the Trials. Professor Pops could fill her in.

Her bottom lip poked out. “None of that matters now. I’m here and you’ll always have a home with me, if you want,” she said, and I sensed her vulnerability.

“Mom,” I said, and a throaty noise escaped her throat. I had to pause and take a deep breath. It felt good to say the word and have it mean so much. She was alive! “I do want to spend time with you, so much, but like Heathcliff, there are people relying on me. I can’t just abandon them.”

Professor Pops wrapped an arm around Joannie. “I’ll fill her in on what’s happening,” he said.

“Thank you,” I responded.

Joannie shook her head and I saw a little of what I imagined Joan of Arc might have been like in her time—commander of an army. Ferocious. But then she took a deep breath and nodded. “I don’t like it, but I understand. Of course I do.” She hugged me again. “Don’t be gone too long, okay?”

“I won’t. Besides,” I gave the two of them a sly grin, “the two of you have each other. I’ll be back when I can.” I thought about Professor Pops being my father and that send a shiver of joy through my heart. I wouldn’t mind in the least.

AFTER REACHING the compound and saying goodbye to Heathcliff, I went to my new rooms. I felt like I was living in a dream. But as soon as I walked in, Styx was there, her face angry. “Where have you been? I thought you’d been taken. I even went to tell Wrythe, I was so worried.”

“What did he say?”

She waved her hands in the air. “I couldn’t find him. Grayson said not to worry, but I’m worried.”

I sank into the nearest chair.

“What’s wrong, Alice? Are you hurt?” Styx asked.

“No, I’m not hurt,” I said, but I had a feeling I would be before too long. If Wrythe was missing, that meant the time had come when I would have to make the worst decision of my entire life. Whatever I decided would ruin me. I knew that.

“Let me make you something to eat. You look pale.” Styx went into the kitchen without waiting for an answer.

I didn’t respond, just sat in the chair, feeling beaten as I let the day’s events wash over me.

Kade, I thought, desperately wishing he could hear me.

I wasn’t surprised when he didn’t respond, but I did sink deeper into despair. A part of me believed this day would never come. In order to function, I’d put the choice in the back of my mind, forcing myself not to think about it. But it’d come anyway or it would be here soon.

Styx fed me something. It was tasteless, but I ate it knowing I needed the nourishment. Then she put me to bed. Before I knew it, morning came. With dread eating my insides, I climbed out of bed and dressed in one of my new uniforms as well as my boots. Then I tucked the demon orb and my knife in my boot as I always did. Afterward, I took Seth’s gun and emptied it of the bullets it held and replaced them with the angel bullets Heathcliff had prepared. I tucked the gun into my boot as well since I had no place else to put it. Walking was a bit awkward, but it was better to go prepared then empty-handed, especially with Seth wandering around Demonland.

Once I was finished, I waited, figuring the Devil would take me at any moment. I practiced my knife skills, then did push-ups, and went through some hand-to-hand combat moves. After three hours, he still hadn’t come for me and I began to question whether it was the Devil who took Kade or his angelic superiors. I went to the door, determined to find Wrythe. When I opened it, I excepted to see Styx. Instead, the white rabbit stood there wearing a formal red jacket and blue pants. He held his pocket watch, his foot beating on the ground with impatience.

“Alice, I’ve been waiting out here for hours. Let’s go. We’re late.” He turned, hopping through the garden. When he reached the rose bushes, he went through to what lay beyond. And I already knew what that was. Emptiness. I was on an island basically and everything past the climbing rose bushes was nothingness. The rabbit would fall to his doom.

"Wait," I yelled. "Don't go that way!" I didn't want to follow because I knew doing so would mean I was that much closer to the end of my second trial. But I didn't want the irritating rabbit to die either. Damnit! When I reached the rose bushes, there wasn't the supposed nothingness, but a rabbit hole. Just as the other times I followed the blasted rabbit, this hole was filled with dirt, brambles, and probably more bugs. I shuddered before going in. This time I went quickly, keeping up with the rabbit. He seemed surprised each time he ogled back and saw I was right behind him.

"Oh, my. Mustn't keep him waiting," he would say before speeding on.

When we reached the door, I was sweaty and covered in dirt. The rabbit put his hand on the doorknob and stopped, adjusting his waistcoat. Then pulled out his pocket watch. "This is not good. So not good. We're late. We're late. We're late."

I stood up straight and wiped the cobwebs off my face. "Why? I'm here aren't I?"

"Yes, but we're late." He went through the door.

I followed, keeping close to him. As expected, my father was sitting on his throne. To the right of him was Wrythe and on the left stood Kade, their hands were tied behind their backs and their mouths had been covered so they couldn't speak. At the sight of them, my heart went into my throat. It was thick, so thick I felt like I might suffocate.

When the Devil saw me, he stood, and walked over. "Finally." He clasped his hands together in front of him. "So, tell me, have you made a decision or are you going to allow all of the Moths to die?"

I growled, not ready for what was coming. "I… Are you sure I need to do this?" Could I procrastinate the inevitable?

The Devil huffed, obviously disappointed in me again. Not that I cared. At all. “Alice, yes. You need to do this.” He turned, heading back to his throne.

With his back to me, I took the orb from my boot, clutching it in my hand like it was my lifeline.

“Choose!” He turned on his heel, his face contorted into such anger, it was frightening.

I crossed my arms, desperate for the orb to do something that would make me believe now was the time to use it. Please, I begged in my mind.

Alice, can you hear me? My heart tried to beat out of my chest at the sound of Kade’s voice in my head.

Yes, I said, trying not to look at him. I wouldn’t give the Devil any more ammunition to use against Kade or me.

Kade’s voice was composed as he continued speaking. Here’s the thing, my love. I want you to choose me.

Panic filled me until all I wanted was to run from the room, screaming. I can’t. I won’t.

Kade went on. If you don’t choose me, then you’ll have to pick Wrythe. Is Wrythe dying an option?

No! I can’t do that. Tears filled my eyes. I couldn’t do this. I couldn’t choose. I loved them both.

You have to choose me. If you don’t, Wrythe will die and the Dark Moth Society will rip itself apart from the inside out. Wrythe must continue to lead. I know he wants to pass the Moths onto you, but you aren’t ready, Alice. I love and support you always, and I believe you can do anything, but Wrythe is the foundation that holds the Dark Moth Society together. They can’t afford to lose him, especially now. You know that’s true.

I did know. Especially after what I’d seen last night. My head still reeled when I thought of demons working for the Dark Moths and the creatures who’d roamed that floor as well as the pixilettes. Hell, even Dora still caused me to shudder.

“Alice, you have five seconds.” The Devil brought both of his hands up in preparation to clap. It terrified me to realize that was all it took—one clap of his hands, and all the Moths would die. “Four.” He sat in his chair. “Three.”

“Please. Give me more time.” I knew Kade was right, but speaking the words… saying his name…

“Two,” the Devil said, shaking his head. “On—”

“Kade!” I shouted. “I choose Kade.” My eyes went back and forth between him and Wrythe. The look on Wrythe’s face told me he was as shocked as I felt. But there hadn’t been a good choice.

The Devil stood, his disappointment turned to surprise. “To clarify, you choose Kade will live? Or die?”

I didn’t want to say the words.

“You’ll have to be specific, my dear, otherwise I might make the wrong decision.”

I glanced down at my feet, unable to meet his piercing gaze. “Kade must die,” I said.

“No!” I heard Wrythe yell around the gag in his throat.

You did good, Alice. You made the right choice. Kade’s words inside my head were soft and accepting. There was no anger, no disbelief, or sense of betrayal. Only peace and conviction. He really did believe what he was saying. That knowledge tore at my insides with such force, I thought I might die.

“Amazing,” the Devil said. “You chose your head over your heart. I didn’t think that was possible. Very good, Alice.” He clapped his hands and Kade burst into white flames.

My angel groaned as his body blackened and turned molten before becoming white hot and exploding into a million pieces of sparkling dust.

Kade was really gone. I didn’t want to believe it. He was immortal, so it shouldn't have been possible. But I'd seen it happen with my own eyes. I fell to my knees as a sob tore from my throat. It literally felt as though my heart had been ripped from chest and I heaved from the agony.

"I can't say I'm sad to see the angel go. He was a thorn in my side, though I did enjoy eating tacos with him and talking football." The lack of emotion in the Devil's voice made me want to punch him.

"Shut up," I screamed. "Stop talking about him like he was your friend. You did this. It's all your fault!"

"I didn't do anything except follow your orders. He's dead because of you, dear Alice. I may have been the executioner, but you were the one who condemned him to die."

I didn't respond, unable to turn my devastation into words that would express exactly how I was feeling.

The Devil sighed, disappointment apparent on his face yet again. With the swish of a hand, Wrythe vanished. I guessed he'd been sent back to Demonland. "Now then," he said, ignoring me. "On to the third challenge. This is the one I'm most eager about because if everything goes the way I think it will, then you will discover your true self, which will lead you back to me."

"I will never serve you," I spat, as tears ran down my face in angry droves.

"Never say never, darling." He went back to his chair and sat. "For the third trial, you will be required to give up the most precious part of yourself in order to save someone you love." An oily grin rose on his lips.

I heard him but didn't acknowledge that I had. Instead, I closed my eyes, letting my body fall to the ground as I curled into a ball. More than anything, I wished to be wherever Kade had gone. We could traverse death as one. If he were with me, I believed I could do anything.

"So dramatic," the Devil said, his voice directly above me.

With a start, I opened my eyes to glare at the Devil, but I was no longer in the throne room. I was back in my new bed in my new room. The pillows were so comfortable and the covers so soft. It felt wrong to be lying on something so amazingly indulgent when Kade was no more. But when I tried to stand, I found I didn't have the strength. Giving in to my exhaustion, I closed my eyes again.

I'd survived the second trial. I'd made my choice. One that sucked beyond belief, but it was done. The Dark Moth Society would survive. The Moths were safe. That knowledge should have stirred something in me, but I didn't care. And in that moment, I knew misery would be my guiding light for the rest of my unhappy life.

OceanofPDF.com

ALICE IGNITES DEMONLAND

OceanofPDF.com

"PASS THE PEAS," Wrythe said, giving me a quick wink before his eyes found my mom's.

I smiled and took a bite of mashed potatoes.

My mom picked up the bowl of creamed peas and handed them to me. "Here you go," she said kindly. She wasn't the biggest fan of Wrythe. It didn't matter that he was a king. He was half-demon, and that made him not good enough for me in her eyes.

We were sitting around the large dining room table in Professor Pops' house. Okay, it was a mansion. The luxurious table could seat twenty, though tonight there were only Professor Pops, my mom, Wrythe, and me.

Eating together once a week had become a habit in the last eleven months. And while spending time with my mom and Professor Pops wasn't awkward, it was sometimes weird. Probably because they didn't eat, but sipped human blood from silver goblets. I was curious where they got the blood, but I hadn't dared to ask.

More than that, I still wasn't used to having my mom around. She'd been human once, nearly six hundred years ago. Then she'd become a revenant and finally a vampire. After killing a lot of people, the chayot discovered her and were ready to kill her, but somehow instead, she'd become an archangel. During her time as the angel of death, she got busy with the Devil, and nine months later, she had me.

After that, they stripped her angelic powers and all memory of me. She was returned to her vampire state, though she still carried some angelic residue. Now that she had Pops back and remembered me, she was happy.

Happy to have me in her life. Happy to be with Professor Pops.

My mom reached over and squeezed my hand lightly. “You look lovely tonight, Alice.” Her face glowed with warmth.

I glanced down at my black dress, the one Haven made. After I became a council member, she created seven more, one for each of the sins. Each dress was divine, and I cherished them. “Thank you, Mom. So do you,” I returned. And it was the truth.

She was a stunning woman with fiery red hair and skin so creamy it looked like milk. Tonight she wore a sleek emerald dress that accentuated her slight form. Her long hair was down, and she wore makeup as well as jewelry, including a ruby and diamond engagement ring on her left hand. Everything about her appeared soft, but it was all an illusion. At one point, she’d led the armies of France to victory against England. And for years, she’d commanded the League of Huntsmen, a group of chayot and humans dedicated to hunting down rogue vampires and evil supernaturals. Sitting like she was now, at the dinner table beside Professor Pops, she looked like a regular, ordinary, albeit stunningly happy woman.

Me, on the other hand?

Well, I wasn’t unhappy.

“You should ask Haven to make you a white dress,” Joannie said.

I lifted a brow in question.

“Or at least a gold one.” She sipped her blood and swallowed. “To represent the angelic part of yourself too,” she added, as though she shouldn’t have to explain herself.

I wouldn’t ask Haven to make me a dress. That just wasn’t done. She was a busy Moth. That she made me eight already went way beyond what she did for most Moths.

Before I could tell my mom that, Wrythe answered. “I’ll be sure to mention that to Haven,” he said kindly. “Alice would be stunning in a white or gold dress.” He caressed my face with his eyes.

“That would be very good of you,” she said, her voice holding only a slight chill.

After so many months together, I'd hoped she would take to Wrythe the way I had. Professor Pops liked him. Why couldn't my mom?

"Did you watch the game last night?" Professor Pops asked Wrythe, changing the subject.

I wanted to kiss my vampire soon-to-be-step-father.

"I did," Wrythe answered, wiping his mouth with a napkin before cutting into his steak. "Can you believe Adams threw that interception right before the half?" he asked, then stuck a bite into his mouth. Even when he was chewing, he was hot.

"Ridiculous," Pops said, then took a big drink.

For the next fifteen minutes, the talk was all about football. My mom joined in as well. She liked the sport nearly as much as the men did.

That gave me time to think. Something I tried not to do, but sometimes it couldn't be helped.

As always, my mind went to Kade. After he died, I didn't think I would ever feel anything but misery. Each day I woke, and every moment until I slept, my thoughts lingered on what I'd done: killed the man I loved. Styx tried to keep me fed, but I refused. Not only that, but I refused to see anyone, including Wendy. It wasn't until Wrythe started showing up daily that I began to open my heart and live again.

He saved my life when I didn't believe it was possible. Tenderly, he'd encouraged me to get back to work. My job was weapons training for the new trainees. Not only that, but Wrythe asked me to be the liaison for the demons who worked for us on level D10. At first, I refused, but Wrythe finally won me over, and truth be told, I enjoyed working with them. The demons there were different than those I'd battled and killed, in more ways than one. They weren't mindless rats like I believed, but possessed thoughts and feelings and even gentleness.

“Alice?” Wrythe touched my hand, giving it a little shake.

“Sorry, what? I missed the question.” I put down my fork and smiled.

His eyes met mine, and they overflowed with so much love.

My beating heart picked up speed. The man was glorious to behold. Long black hair. Piercing gray eyes. An incredibly muscled body and kissable lips. But he was more than that. He was generous and loved me in a way I sometimes struggled to comprehend.

But I loved him right back. When I finally opened my heart, I’d clung to Wrythe. He became my everything. And loving him was as natural as breathing.

He smiled. “Are you ready for dessert? Your mother made it.”

“Oh,” I returned his smile with one of my own. “Definitely.” I pushed away my plate.

“I’ll go get it,” Professor Pops said and stood.

“I’ll help,” my mom added and followed him out of the dining room.

“Did I drive them away?” I asked, my tone only slightly teasing.

“Doubtful. They’re probably going in there to get a moment alone.” Wrythe took my hand and kissed my fingers, sending a different kind of hunger shooting through my veins.

Before I could act on my needs, Pops and Mom were back. She carried a bottle of non-alcoholic bubbly since the alcohol didn’t affect us anyway. Her face was unreadable. Pops had two glass bowls filled with something that looked like pudding. He set down mine first.

“For you,” Pops said, giving me a strange smile.

“Looks delicious,” I said, picking up my spoon. It looked like chocolate mousse topped with raspberries and whipped cream.

“Hopefully, it tastes as good as it looks,” Mom said. “I’m still practicing my cooking skills, and sometimes the directions are a little tricky.” She rolled her eyes nervously. Her trepidation was endearing.

“I’m sure it’ll taste great.” I waited until Wrythe had his, and then we dug in together. I put the bite in my mouth and was shocked by the bitterness of the chocolate. It tasted like she used too much. Not wanting to hurt her feelings, I worked to swallow. A glance at Wrythe told me he was struggling the same as me. “It tastes good,” I lied, grateful for the raspberries and cream to cut through.

“Are you sure? I thought I might have used too much of the chocolate.” Mom’s features were taut with anxiety.

“Maybe just a little,” I admitted but took another scoop. Mom wasn’t a cook, and it didn’t help that she couldn’t sample what she was making. To her, it all tasted like ash. At least that was what she told me once.

Pops wrapped an arm around her shoulders. “You are amazing, my love.”

Wrythe scooped more onto his spoon but didn’t have the stomach to put it in his mouth.

I figured I’d just gulp my bite down quickly, but as it touched my tongue, I felt something hard. I sucked and swallowed all, but whatever it was and then pulled it from my mouth. “What’s this?” I asked, looking at Joannie and Pops before glancing at Wrythe.

All three were watching me intently.

Surprised, I glanced down at the thing in my hand, my pulse quickening. Using my napkin, I wiped it off. Was it what I thought it was? “A diamond ring?” I asked, confused.

Wrythe pushed out his chair and got down on one knee. With his seven-foot frame, we were nearly face-to-face. He gulped, and I saw a whisper of what looked like fear on his face. “Alice,” he said, taking the ring and dipping it in his water glass. Then he swirled it around until the water was brown and the ring was clean.

I thought my heart would pound out of my chest. “What are you doing?” I asked, pressing the back of my hand over my mouth. Was he about to propose? It sure as hell looked like it.

He gave me an enormous smile. “Alice Blackburn,” he started again. “I love you and have loved you for months.” He licked his lips. “It was after you slew that demon in the parking lot of the Mexican restaurant that I first knew my feelings for you had become something like love. During that week, as I watched you, fought beside you, and got to know you, my feelings grew. You are so beautiful, determined, committed, and, might I say, kick-ass.” He chuckled, and I laughed with him, releasing some of the tension. “That was all it took for me to fall head over heels. Since then, I’ve done my best to show you what my love looks like, and I think you love me too.” He paused, shifting his weight slightly.

I found myself nodding my head. “I do. Wrythe, I love you very much,” I responded, feeling like I’d tumbled into a tub of ice. I was awake and alert as never before because I did love him. With all of my heart. Or at least as much as I could. But wasn’t love like a flower? With water and if given enough sun and nutrients, the bloom would last longer and would be much more vibrant. Wrythe was worth the time and effort, and we would be great together.

“Then will you do me the honor of becoming my wife? Queen of Demonland. To rule equally at my side?” Had I heard a tremor in his voice? This moment was a big deal for him. He was showing all of his cards and doing it in front of my mom and Pops.

“Wrythe,” I started and cleared my throat. Was saying yes the right thing to do? I bit my bottom lip as I debated, but only for the briefest second. “Yes,” I whispered, leaning in and kissing him.

His mouth on mine was delectable, and as his hands gripped at my hips, it was just him and me and all the love and passion our kiss possessed.

Pops cleared his throat.

Embarrassed, I leaned back.

Wrythe took my hand and placed the grand and sparkly oval diamond solitaire on my finger. He noticed my hand was shaking and held my fingers. “You’ve made me the happiest man in the world,” he confessed, kissing the palm of my hand. It was intimate, and I shivered. “I love you,” he said.

My eyes met his. I was still tingling with an electric fire. “I love you, too.”

After my Mom and Pops offered their congratulations and several toasts, we used magic to port back into Demonland and right into my bedroom. The door was already closed, and Wrythe took the opportunity to spin me around to unzip my dress. “We’ll announce our engagement tomorrow after dinner,” he said, kissing one shoulder and trailing more kisses across my naked back.

At the feel of his lips and his five o’clock shadow against my skin, I sighed. His mouth was distracting, but I couldn’t help a small worry over what he’d said. Sure, most of the Dark Moths had accepted me and were even friendly, but if I were to marry their king? I didn’t know how they would take it. “Are you sure that’s wise?” I asked, reaching around to touch him. “Maybe we should keep it a secret for a while.” Turning, I unbuttoned his shirt, running my hands over his broad chest. His cologne was a heady but subtle combination of leather and ginger. Evocative enough that I wanted to taste his skin.

I was desperate for him. To love and be loved by him. It was time. Tonight we would take our love to the next level. There was no doubt about it.

Wrythe’s eyes went dark, like thunderclouds before the rain. He lifted me onto the bed. I moved back until my head reached the pillows, and he followed, his eyes holding mine until he was above me. “I couldn’t keep our engagement a secret even if I wanted to. You’ve made me the happiest Moth that ever lived.” He bent and kissed each of my eyes, cheeks, and chin before his lips crashed into mine.

I arched into him, clinging to his shoulders.

OceanofPDF.com

THE NEXT MORNING, when I woke, Wrythe was already gone, but his scent lingered. A red rosebud lay on his pillow with a note that was simple yet perfect. I love you, it said. A flood of love for the man filled my chest. Loving him was a gift, and I felt blessed having him in my life.

I picked up the flower to smell the bud, and my thumb caught on a thorn. “Ouch.” A dot of blood appeared on my skin. Climbing out of bed, I went to the sink in the master bathroom and rinsed it off. By the time I looked at it again, there wasn’t any proof of a jab.

My ring caught my attention, and I turned my hand back and forth, allowing the diamond to sparkle in the light. Then I held it up so I could see it in my reflection.

“I’m getting married,” I whispered at the woman looking back at me. A bubble of excitement raced along my veins. My reflection appeared eager, and I leaned in closer, looking for signs of the girl I’d been a year ago. At that time, I’d just turned eighteen and believed all that mattered was the Devil's death.

Things in my life had changed dramatically.

I’d changed.

Removing the ring, I set it on the counter and went over to turn on the shower. As the warm water rushed over my body, I thought about last night. It had been magical, better than I could’ve imagined. Wrythe was tender and so very giving. At the thought of his mouth on my skin and our lovemaking, desire coursed along my belly. Yes, he and I were right together.

After I dried myself off, I braided my hair back, so it was out of my face and dressed in my Dark Moth warrior uniform, tucking my knife and the demon orb into my boot.

In the kitchen, Styx was singing softly while she prepared breakfast.

When she saw me, she smiled. “Alice,” she said. “Good morning.”

“Morning,” I said, going over and getting some water.

“I’ve made you eggs, bacon, toast, and Cook sent over some fresh strawberries. Food will be ready in just a few minutes.”

“Sounds amazing,” I said and went to the front door. “I’ll be back.”

Styx smiled. “You’re too sweet to those pixilettes. They don’t deserve you.”

I didn’t respond but went out into the garden. The roses were always blooming, and the garden smelled so good thanks to the pixilette Daya and her family. When she saw me, she flew over, landing on my outstretched hand. “Alice, did you have a nice time with your mother?”

“Really good. The company, the conversation—”

“How was the food? Did your mom burn it again?” She tucked her blue hair behind one tiny ear as her matching wings fluttered.

“No, actually, it was good.” I’d told her how my mom was learning to cook, and I appreciated that Daya remembered. “Except, the dessert was a little bitter until…” I gasped. “My ring,” I said, looking at my hand. My ring finger was bare. I’d left it in the bathroom.

“Ring?” Daya asked, concerned.

Should I tell her? If I did, would all of Demonland know before Wrythe made the announcement later that night? “Can you keep a secret?” I asked, deciding I had to tell someone. Might as well be one of my dearest friends.

She glanced around, her hair flipping back and forth. Then she took off and flew in a circle before facing me. “Of course I can, Alice,” she whispered, and it sounded like the soft tinkling of a bell. Then she crossed her heart with her pointer finger. “What is it?” Her lashes batted as she spoke.

“Wrythe asked me to marry him,” I whispered, forcing myself not to laugh. It was hard because she was seriously so cute.

“What?” Styx threw open the door before Daya could respond. “You’re going to tell the pixil your news before you share it with me?” She stuck out her bottom lip, pouting.

I bumped into her with my hip. “I was going to tell you over breakfast,” I said.

That appeased her. “Alright, then.” She smiled big. “Food’s ready anyway, so come inside.” She disappeared back through the door.

“Have a great day,” I said to Daya.

She hugged my finger. “Congrats Alice.” Then she bowed. “Queen of the Moths.” She giggled. “I like the sound of that.”

“Thank you, Daya,” I said, feeling only a little uncomfortable. As a trainee, I was called the Queen of Hearts. It was a name that stuck. What would everyone say about my becoming a real queen? Was I even ready? I guess I had time. It wasn’t like we would marry anytime soon. I felt sure there were lots of things to be done before Wrythe and I became official.

Once I finished breakfast, I returned to my room. I debated whether to wear my engagement ring. It would be dangerous since I was teaching weapons training, and I didn’t want to lose it. Instead, I tucked it into my top drawer under my socks. Then I took the walkway over to the elevator and rode it over to the next one, which took me up into the Demonland compound. There was I greeted by several trainees and Summer, the Sloth council member. We exchanged pleasant greetings.

“Any idea why Wrythe is in such a damn great mood?” Summer asked, her brows raised in question.

“I’m not sure,” I said, sidestepping.

“He announced a meeting after dinner. You wouldn’t happen to know what he intends to say?" She crossed her arms and eyed me carefully.

"Again, I'm not quite sure." I shrugged and tried to smile; grateful I hadn't worn my engagement ring. "I guess you'll have to wait until tonight to find out." I wasn't fibbing, just giving a neutral answer.

"I guess." She continued down the hall.

I breathed a sigh of relief. Dinner was in nine hours. Surely I could make it until then. There was plenty to do.

I TAUGHT two classes back to back. Each lasted two hours, and by the time I finished, I was hungry. Heading over to the cafeteria, I hoped to see Wrythe, and we could eat lunch together. I wasn't disappointed. He sat with Elanor and Pratt.

I quickly got my food, which was meatloaf and mashed potatoes, as well as a drink, and sat across from Wrythe.

As soon as I was sitting, his eyes went to my ring finger. There was evident relief on his face, and he nodded. "Alice, how were your morning classes?"

"Really good. There are a couple of amazing trainees," I said, before cutting into my meat. As I spoke, Wrythe's booted foot found mine under the table, and he tapped me lightly. Just that little movement, even in such a non-intimate way, had butterflies in my stomach fluttering. My hunger grew, but not for food. I needed my fiancé. Something in my face must've revealed what I was thinking because his eyes darkened.

"There is something of importance I need to discuss with you in my office. Care to finish your lunch there while we talk?" Wrythe asked. He sounded professional, his voice not revealing anything except what he said.

I was impressed. After swallowing my bite, I wiped my mouth. "Um, sure. If it's urgent." I glanced over at Eleanor and Pratt. They were busy discussing their own thing and barely noticed.

“Extremely,” he said and stood, taking his tray.

I did the same, but before I could follow, Wendy showed up.

“Hey, Alice,” she said, sitting down. “Leaving already?”

I took a quick breath to steady my nerves. “Wrythe needs to discuss something.” I shrugged but noticed my voice sounded way to eager. “Who knows with him,” I added, rolling my eyes.

She giggled. “I wouldn’t mind spending alone time with King Wrythe.” She bit her bottom lip.

A flash of jealousy slashed through my heart. “Yeah, I guess you’re right. He isn’t bad to look at,” I admitted.

Immediately, I knew I’d said too much.

Summer looked over at me, glaring. “He is still the king,” she snapped.

“You’re right,” I admitted.

Wendy was oblivious to my gaffe and said goodbye. I returned it before following after Wrythe. As I went, I said hello to those I passed. Many responded cordially. Now that I was on the council, it appeared that most everyone had accepted who and what I was. But some still ignored me. If I wanted, I could bring charges against them, but doing so would go against everything I was trying to accomplish.

At Wrythe’s office door, I knocked.

He opened it immediately. In one movement, my food was on his desk, and I was in his arms, his mouth on mine.

I wrapped my arms around his waist, pulling him to me before running my hands along his back and moving to his chest. It was ridiculous there was so much clothing between us. I wanted to rip his shirt off.

He felt the same way, unzipping my uniform down the front.

“I’m going to make love to you right here and right now,” he said, his voice hoarse as he kissed along my jaw to my ear.

I shivered at the thought. “You better,” I pleaded, my fingers fumbling over the final button on his shirt.

“Wrythe,” someone called from the other side of the door. The handle jiggled.

“This is why I lock it,” Wrythe growled, trailing kisses across my collarbones. “They’ll go away,” he said.

But whoever it was knocked louder. “Hellooooo, it’s Summer. I need to speak with you,” she said in a sing-song voice.

She’d been at the lunch table with us, which meant she knew we were in here.

“Damn,” I said, leaning back so I could see Wrythe’s eyes better.

“Double damn,” he added, before pressing my lips open, kissing me deeply. He was also buttoning up his shirt.

I sighed, knowing our moment was over and zipped up the top of my uniform.

“Just a minute,” Wrythe said, tucking in his shirt and adjusting his pants. Then he ran his thumb across my bottom lip, his hand resting against my neck.

The way he touched me—like I was already his—set my stomach aflame. Also, I wanted to smack Summer for interrupting us.

After one more quick check of himself and me, he opened the door.

“Thank you, sire,” I said, keeping my head down as I casually pushed passed Summer.

“I didn’t mean to intrude,” she said, which was so obviously a lie.

No matter, though. After tonight, everyone would know we were engaged, and then making out with the king would be perfectly acceptable.

“No worries,” I called, but didn’t turn around.

There was still time until my next class, but I went early to practice. It was always good to stay sharp. Peter told us that all the time. At the thought of him, my heart saddened. I selected the katana, my favored weapon, and went through several drills until the bell rang, telling the trainees they had five minutes to get to class.

A sheen of sweat ran the length of my back, but I didn't stop the drills, using the effort to help me forget about how much my body longed to be with Wrythe.

When the final bell rang, I stopped and was surprised to note that the class was all there and were watching me.

I bowed.

They returned it.

"Let's begin," I said. Then I went to work, giving them instructions about how to hold the katana and the benefits of using the weapon to slay menial demons.

Once classes finished, I was covered in sweat and took a quick shower to rinse off in the women's locker room before changing into a clean uniform and letting out my hair. It had dried with waves in it from the braid, and I left it down before making my way over to the elevator.

"Alice," Wendy called, running to catch up with me.

"Hey, Wen, how's your day been?" It was still such a pleasant surprise that we'd become friends.

"Fine," she said, but her features clouded.

"Trouble with Grayson?" Wendy was still assisting the Gluttony council member. From what I could tell, he kept her always busy, so she rarely had time to go out on demon hunts.

The elevator opened, and the two of us entered together.

"He is…" she paused and pursed her lips, her gray eyes looking troubled. "Needy," she finally finished.

I had wondered if she and Grayson were together, but she hadn't said, and I didn't feel it was my place to pry. "What do you mean?" I asked, trying to keep it light.

She crossed her arms. "Have you ever dated someone?" she asked.

“Yes,” I said as the doors closed. “Where to?”

“Oh, I don’t need to go anywhere.” She pressed open the elevator doors and got out. “I wondered if you wanted to go to the club with me and some friends tonight.”

“How thoughtful,” I said, stepping between the doors to keep them open. “I would love to.” It’d been weeks since we’d hung out.

“Cool.” A natural smile curved her lips. “Meet me in my room at ten?”

“I’ll be there.” I stepped back inside the elevator. As the doors closed, I waved.

“See ya,” she said.

When I was in the elevator alone, the plastic over D10 appeared, and I pressed it, waiting for the tentacles to appear and taste my blood. The creature who vetted me was called Dora.

“Hello, Alice,” she said

“Dora,” I replied, leaning against the rail and wondering if I would ever get used to my new life.

As the elevator went, I thought about what the menial demons wanted to discuss with me. For the most part, everyone did their part without incident or trouble. Occasionally though, there were little squabbles and in-fighting, and it was up to me to help them solve their problems.

As soon as the door pinged open on level ten, I was surrounded by a dozen or more menials.

“Come, Miss Alice. You have to see.”

“See?” I was confused but allowed them to walk me through the common area and down the walkway to a small park created for the menial children to play.

“Look,” another said, and pointed.

In the center of the park stood a grand tree, probably four feet wide at the base, that reached more than a hundred feet in the air. I was aware that it didn't make sense. Level ten was in between two floors, and they didn't seem to be so far apart, but after everything I saw since my inauguration into the Society, I didn't question the magic of the place.

As I studied the tree, I noticed something odd attached to the trunk. "What is it?" I asked, thinking they wanted me to play a game. Pin the tail on the Dark Moth trainee was a massive hit with the younger menials.

"Death," one of them shouted and moaned.

"They've found us," another said.

My pulse quickened as I saw that a tracker demon's stomach had been sliced open, his guts spilling out. Each hand and foot had a dagger shoved into them. On his forehead was painted a single word in what looked like the demon's own blood.

Traitor.

Fury rose like bile in my throat, and I rushed forward, yanking the knives from his appendages. As I carefully eased the demon's broken body to the ground, he moaned.

"I've got you, Soreth," I said, quietly. This sloth demon worked in the laundry and was very particular about keeping clothes clean. He moved a bit more slowly than others on his team, but there wasn't a better launderer among all the demons. Plus, he was kind. He'd been one of the first mid-level demons on this level to show me any kindness.

Soreth tried to take my hand. His lips moved, and I leaned in, careful to avoid a particularly oozing sore on his cheek, and took his bloodied hand in mine. "What did you say?" For the first time, I realized there wasn't a demon doctor. That must be rectified.

"He was here. Betrayed." Soreth closed his eyes, and his hand dropped before he turned to ash.

My demon power roared red as my wrath pulsed through my veins. I whirled around, scaring the demons who'd brought me. "Who did this?" I hissed, making eye contact with each of them.

Some shuffled their feet while others looked away.

"Come on. Someone had to see something," I said, ignoring the fact that I was covered in Soreth's ashy remains.

"A man," came a response, but I didn't see who said it.

"Which man?" I asked, searching through the group. "I need a name. Step forward and tell me what you saw."

A small lust demon carefully made her way to the front of the group. She looked terrified, and I knelt in front of her so that she didn't feel so intimidated.

"What's your name?" I asked, softly, so as not to frighten her further.

"Launa," she said quietly, staring at her hand.

"It's okay," I said, and took a deep breath, shoving away my demon power. "I'm not upset with you. Soreth was a friend, and I'm angry someone did that to him." Sometimes it helped to keep it simple.

She smiled, showing off her sharp black teeth. "That is what we love about you, Alice," she said and relaxed.

"Good, now tell me all you know."

She started picking at a scab on her arm. I wanted to tell her to stop but resisted and ground my teeth together, trying to be patient. "The man appeared and met Soreth. They were talking, and I believe Soreth said the man's name was Seth."

My head began to pound. At the council member ceremony, Seth had appeared and threatened Wrythe and all of us. He'd also spoken to me before vanishing. But since then, no one had seen him. We'd kept guards by all of the elevators for months until eventually, we decided Seth no longer intended to bother us. But now, he was back. "Thank you, Launa. You've been most helpful." I stood and saw there was a vast crowd of demons all around me. The old me would've seen them as a challenge and been excited to see how many I could slay. Not anymore. These demons were good, just as there were Dark Moths who were bad.

Spinning in a circle, I spoke. “I will take what’s happened to Wrythe. The king will know what to do,” I said in a loud voice so all of them could hear. Then less loudly, I went on. “I’m so sorry this happened. We will find Seth, and we won’t rest until he is brought to justice. You can count on me.”

OceanofPDF.com

AFTER ANOTHER SHOWER and being peppered with Styx's questions, I made it to the cafeteria only five minutes late. Wrythe was seated and already had his food. He saw me and smiled. Then he must've seen something on my face because he stood and came over.

"What is it?" he asked.

"Seth is back," I said gravely, not feeling very hungry.

"Did you see him?" He took me by the elbow, and we went over to one side, next to a wall, so we were out of the way.

"No, but he tortured Soreth, one of the sloth demons." I ground my teeth together.

Luke walked into the cafeteria, saw us, and began to make his way over.

"I'll tell you more later tonight," I said just as Luke arrived.

"Wrythe, I need to speak with you about an issue I'm having with one of the trainees," he said.

"Of course, but not until after dinner." Turning to me, Wrythe said, "Get your food. I'll save you a place." He squeezed my elbow. "I'm sorry about Soreth. I know he was a friend."

"Thank you," I said somberly.

Once I had my food, I sat beside Wrythe, but I struggled to eat. When he finished, he had Cook bring out some special cider. As soon as all of the glasses were filled, Wrythe stood.

"Moths," he began, clanking his knife on the glass for silence.

Everyone quieted.

"Thank you. I have some great news," he began and looked at me.

I smiled, suddenly beyond nervous. What would everyone think?

"As you know, Alice and I have gotten to know each other very well over the last year. It's been my pleasure to work side by side with her, and last night, I proposed." He paused for effect, but it wasn't necessary. You could've heard a pin drop. The cafeteria was so quiet. "So please raise your glasses, and let's drink to Alice, my fiancée, and the soon-to-be queen of Demonland." He sipped from his glass, but no one else moved.

Summer, the Sloth council member stood. Her face was an emotionless mask, but she raised her glass. "To Wrythe and Alice." She lifted her glass again, then took a drink.

One by one, the other council members did the same. By the time the last of the seven, Glenna was done, the rest of the Moths had stood.

As one, they chanted, "To Wrythe and Alice."

When Wrythe sat back down, the room erupted in anxious conversation. Wrythe wasn't bothered. He looked at me, and all I saw was his happiness. I was sure he saw mine reflected at him. At least I hoped so.

After out dessert of peach cobbler and vanilla mint ice cream, Wrythe took my hand and kissed my fingers. "I'll see you later tonight?"

It was then I remembered Wendy and our plans. "I'm going to go above ground with Wendy and some friends."

"Sounds fun. I'll be waiting when you get back."

The way he spoke sent a shiver of desire down to my toes. "Good," I whispered.

He headed to his office and was followed by several of the council.

After waving to Wendy, and promising her I'd see her at ten, I took the elevators over to my new rooms, hoping to get some rest before I went out. As I made my way down the walk, I glanced at my beautiful rose garden and the little cottage and realized how right Styx had been when she said this would be a place I would come to more and more. I hadn't slept in the actual compound in months.

Once I was in my garden, I walked over to the bench, thinking to sit a moment and remember my friend Soreth, but my father had other plans.

He appeared out of thin air, as was his way.

"You will not marry Wrythe," the Devil seethed, dark light sparking all around him.

I gasped in shock. I hadn't seen my father since the end of my second Trial when Kade had died. I'd nearly forgotten about the final Trial. What had my father said? "For the third trial, you will be required to give up the most precious part of yourself to save someone you love."

I sucked in a sharp breath. "Go away," I said, knowing I sounded childish.

"I will not," he said and crossed his arms. "You are too good to marry the king of the Dark Moths," he said through clenched teeth.

I found it slightly amusing that my mom and dad agreed on something.

"It's none of your business," I retaliated, clenching my fists.

"I didn't want to do this, but it seems I don't have a choice." He raised his hands like he would clap.

"You're going to kill me now?" That was how he'd killed the council members. Dread and fear raced along my veins. A year ago, dying might have been a nice reprieve, but now I wanted to live, marry Wrythe, and have a family.

"No, dear girl." He glared. "But I'm tired of waiting. The sooner you figure out every part of yourself, the sooner you'll be able to complete the third Trial."

"What do you mean?" I asked, my stomach turning into knots. Nothing good ever came of fulfilling his wishes. My father refused to let me be happy.

“What I mean is that I’m sending you to the angel realm.” He dropped his hands, tucking them into the front pockets of his suit pants.

“Why would you do that? I don’t care about that half of myself anymore,” I said and meant it. Leaving Wrythe was out of the question. I would be lost without him.

Sure, Kade’s superiors had demanded I go there. They’d said they believed in a prophecy that had something to do with me. But after Kade died, I hadn’t heard anything more from the angels and figured they wanted nothing to do with me.

The Devil rolled his eyes. “You have no idea whether you care about it or not because you haven’t given that part of you a chance.”

“But I thought you wanted me to embrace my demon half.” I was too surprised and confused to think about what I was saying.

“Oh, I do, and I have every confidence you will choose to come to me, but you will never fully commit until you know what the angelic part of you has to offer.” He took a step toward me, and I flinched.

I couldn’t reason with him, so I decided to beg. “Please,” I said. “I love Wrythe and want to marry him. Don’t take me from him.”

“You aren’t going anywhere.”

Wrythe was suddenly there, broad as a bull and just as angry. “Get away from her,” he seethed, his power rippling off him.

My father glanced back and forth between us. Then he clapped his hands.

I screamed, thinking he had killed Wrythe, but instead, Wrythe was tied up in black chords, and his mouth gagged.

“Do not hurt him,” I said, running past the Devil until I reached Wrythe.

“It’s okay,” Wrythe said around the rope in his mouth.

“You will go to the angel realm, and you will learn all there is to learn about the angelic half of yourself. If you don’t, I will kill Wrythe." He was suddenly directly in front of me. "But more than that, I will end your mother once and for all." His eyes glistened with fury.

Cold flooded me. I knew he was telling the truth. "How long?" I asked.

"How long what?" he spat, sending spittle onto my cheek.

"How long do I have to remain in the angel realm?" I asked as wrath rolled along my skin.

"As long as it takes, daughter." The Devil wrapped one of his hands around my throat and lifted me off the ground.

Wrythe shouted for him to stop, but I didn't struggle.

I held Wrythe's gaze. "Free Wrythe, and promise you won't return to Demonland while I'm gone." The words came out in gasps since it was hard to breathe.

The Devil put me down. "You're in no position to bargain, but fine. I give you my word Wrythe will be safe and sound, as will this compound, while you're in the angel realm."

I sucked in a deep breath. "Will they even let me in?"

"They are anxiously awaiting your arrival." He turned and walked over to Wrythe. "Do we have a deal?"

I was taught never to make a deal with the Devil, but I didn't have a choice. "Yes," I said and rushed over to Wrythe. He was still tied up, and I wrapped my arms around him as best I could. "I love you, Wrythe."

Before Wrythe could respond, the Devil clapped his hands, and I was no longer in Demonland.

OceanofPDF.com

"YOU MUST BE ALICE."

Her voice was warm, and as I turned, I saw a lovely angel with a smile that filled the room. "I am," I said softly, forcing myself not to cry. But Wrythe? I already missed him. My heart ached, and all I wanted to do was curl up in a ball and cry. My ring still rested on the counter in my bathroom. I hoped Wrythe found it and would keep it safe. Fury burned deep in my center, and I wanted nothing more than to slay some rachet demons.

But I was in the angel realm. Here, I wouldn't find any evil.

"You're safe," the woman said.

"Thank you." I would tough this out since it was part of the Trials. Even the angels were willing to work with the Devil if it was to their benefit. Kade said his superiors believed I had something to do with a prophecy, and they wanted me to come to the angel realm.

Well, here I am, I thought darkly.

The angel came forward. Her skin was dark, and her hair was black and curled tightly around her head. Eyes the color of the setting sun, a combination of orange or yellow or both and deep red lips stood out on her heart-shaped face. She was probably half a foot shorter than me, and her wings were black except the ends, which were the same color as her eyes. Similarly, she wore a black uniform like mine. "I am Tillie." She held out her hand.

I gripped her forearm the way Dark Moth's greeted each other. Confusion formed on her brow, but only for a moment before she smiled and returned my greeting. "It's good to meet you," I said, hoping that sounded true.

Tillie gave me a radiant smile. "Your effort is appreciated, but I know you are engaged to be married to the king of the Moths and would rather be with your betrothed." She released my arm and went over to a stark white table where two glasses and a pitcher were filled with a clear liquid. I guessed it was water.

I gave the room a quick perusal. Everything was white, including the walls, the ceiling, the floor, even the furniture. Thankfully there were accents of oranges and yellows to break up the monotony.

After she'd poured us each a glass, she handed one to me. "Drink," she said.

"Thank you." I smelled it. There was a hint of something sweet, and I sipped. It was water, but the most delicious water I'd ever tasted. And I realized I was parched. Before I could stop myself, I drank the whole glass. "That is delicious water," I said, wishing I had more.

"It comes from Rymi Cascades on the other side of the realm." She sipped hers before placing it back on the table. "Would you like to see some of our realm before I take you to meet Raphael?"

I forced myself not to shrug. "That would be great." My father demanded I be here. I might as well make the most of it. Because the sooner I figured out what it meant to be an angel, the sooner I could return to Wrythe.

And then you must complete the third trial, I thought, trying to figure out what it could possibly mean that I would have to give up the most precious part of myself to save someone I love. No answers came, and I pushed those contemplations away.

Tillie took my glass and set it on the table next to hers before walking to a door. Once it was open, she held it for me. I peeked out and into a glorious green meadow filled with white flowers. In the distance and beyond the field was a tall golden gate with two enormous doors. On either side of the gate stood angels with all-white wings dressed in a white uniform.

I stepped out and noticed under my feet was a shimmering golden path that led to the gate. The air was the same as inside the room.

Neither cold nor hot, but just right. As quietly as possible, I breathed in through my nose curious what the angel realm smelled like. Demonland always held a hint of sulfur. Here all I could smell was the flowers on either side of the path. They were light and sweet like honey.

"Right this way," Tillie said, coming to stand beside me.

I kept time with her while we walked as I studied my surroundings.

"You're nineteen, right?" she asked.

I didn't understand why my age mattered when it occurred to me, she was just trying to make conversation.

Calming myself, I bit the inside of my cheek. "Yes," I finally said. "I had my birthday a couple of weeks ago." I turned back to see how far we'd come and saw the building we'd come from was just the size of the room I met her in. "What do you call that place?" I asked, pointing back at the building.

"That is a Welcome Station. In the angel realm, there are four," she said pleasantly. "When do you intend to marry the Moth king?" She was back to asking casual questions.

"I'm not sure," I admitted. "We didn't really have the chance to talk about anything beyond the proposal." Talking about Wrythe was like a knife stabbing me through the heart as I bled out anguish.

"Well, after you spend some time here, you might change your mind anyway."

My hands became fists at my side. "Highly unlikely, given how much I love him," I said through clenched teeth.

She didn't respond because we arrived at the tall, double gates. The angels standing on either side of the door held a spear in one hand. On their breast pocket was an insignia of a pair of angel wings with SA overlapping them.

"SA?" I asked, curious. Several words, including a few curses with the letter S came to mind but I kept them to myself.

“Seraph Academy,” she said, flicking her hand.

Immediately the angels opened the gates.

Beyond the gate was what looked like an enormous building, like the skyscrapers in big cities like New York, except these were all white. “Why is the academy protected?” I asked, thinking guards and protection were wasted here.

“It’s important to give extra protection to those angels still learning. The fence keeps the students safe from everything else,” she said as she walked through into the courtyard.

I followed as the quiet of the land beyond the gates gave way to the shouts and laughter of dozens of angels. Some were chasing each other through the air in a flying game of tag. Others sat together on the grass, their wings tucked away.

They all stopped what they were doing and stared like I was the new animal at the zoo.

I didn’t like the feeling. Not one bit. “Why am I here? I have no intention of attending school,” I hissed and debated whether I could be outside the gates before anyone got a good look at me. The thought of going to more classes and all that went with schooling made me sick inside. I was a teacher, not a freaking student. Those days were over.

“But you must,” Tillie said. “Otherwise, how will you learn what you need to about your angelic half.”

I didn’t want to make a scene, but it wasn’t happening. If the angels wanted me to learn about that part of myself, they would have to find another way. “No,” I said, crossing my arms, defensive.

We nearly reached the closest building. The bottom floor was almost entirely made of glass, and I could see angels inside, though their wings weren’t visible. All around me, angels stopped what they were doing. Some whispered and pointed. My eyes flicked back and forth, studying them, desperate to disappear.

“Let’s go talk to Raphael,” she said and began walking faster. She didn’t like to be the center of attention any more than I did.

“Fine.” I kept my teeth clenched together, wishing I was anywhere but here.

Inside the building, angels were hurrying to get to wherever they had to be. Some looked at me, but most were too intent on where they were going. A few had their wings out, the feathered edges fluttering as they went.

Tillie walked up to the long, white desk and stopped in front of a man with stark white hair and silver wings. “We’re here to see Raphael,” she said.

The man flicked his gaze to me before making a sour face. “What is this about? Archangel Raphael is very busy today.”

“This is Alice Blackburn. He will want to speak with her,” Tillie insisted, leaning on the counter.

At my name, the angel’s eyes got wide. “Absolutely.” He stood and disappeared through a door directly behind him.

Tillie turned. “I need to get back to my Station. You shouldn’t have to wait too long.” She started for the door and turned. “It was nice to meet you, Alice. Good luck.” Then she went through the doors and lifted into the air.

I watched as she dodged through the group of kids playing tag before landing in front of the gate. I wondered at that. Why didn’t she just fly over? The answer came when someone knocked a ball in the direction. It appeared it would go over the fence, but instead, it hit an invisible force that incinerated the ball.

“Super,” I whispered, turning back to the desk to wait for the white-haired man to return.

Tillie was right. I didn’t have to wait long. He returned with another angel with pasty skin, broad shoulders, and a uniform the same color as mine and Tillie’s.

“Welcome, Alice,” he said, though he didn’t sound very welcoming. On his back, he carried a great sword. “If you will come with me.” He eyed me like I was a menial rat and didn’t wait as he started passed the common area and toward what looked like elevators.

I mean, I shouldn’t have been surprised. In Demonland, we had elevators, why not in the angel realm? Angelland? I wanted to laugh at my joke, but the warrior angel gave me a look that said one false move, and there’d be a fight. So I kept it to myself.

On the ride up, we didn’t speak, and I took the opportunity to check out the walls. They looked like they were padded, and I touched one to verity. Yep, padded.

The elevator was faster than the one in Demonland, and before I had much of a change, the doors opened on the top floor.

“Right this way,” the warrior said.

I decided to make conversation the way Tillie had. “What’s your name?” I asked.

“It doesn’t matter,” he grumbled.

Fine, I thought.

We arrived at another door, which I guessed must be the entrance to Raphael’s office. The warrior knocked once and then turned, so he stood to the right of the door, looking straight ahead, as though I wasn’t even there.

“Come in, Alice,” the voice on the other side of the door said.

For some reason, his words gave me the chills.

The warrior opened the door and pushed it aside. “Go on then,” he snapped.

I swallowed, keeping my hands loose, determined not to let this Raphael see that I was nervous.

The plan was going great. There was a large white desk with an equally sizable white chair. The back of it was to me, so I couldn’t see the archangel. Twin chairs were on my side of the desk, but I had no reason to sit.

“Thank you for having me,” I said, raising an eyebrow curious about why the angel wasn’t facing me.

Slowly he spun around.

And a scream caught in my throat.

OceanofPDF.com

"WHAT ARE YOU DOING HERE?" I asked, thinking perhaps I wasn't really in the angel realm but in a nightmare. Before me was a man who looked exactly like my father. The only difference was his hair color. My dad's hair was black. This man had white hair.

He wore a white suit and clasped his hands together in the same way my dad did, and though he wasn't seated on a throne, he might as well have been.

The man gave me an oily smile, and I thought I might be sick.

"You can see the similarities between your father and myself, I take it," he said and sounded familiar.

Um, yeah, that was an understatement. "Definitely," I said, trying to keep it together. "Are you my father?" The question sounded preposterous, but I had to ask.

"No, but I am the Devil's brother." He pushed back his chair and went to stand at the floor to ceiling windows behind it.

I touched my cheeks, thinking it felt like he'd slapped me. "How is that possible?" My hands became fists, and I felt my demon power ignite within. If the Devil were playing, he would quickly find out I wasn't in the mood.

"Come, Alice," he said, waving me over to stand beside him.

Carefully, I moved, feeling the knife in my boot as well as the demon orb. When I was close, he held out his hand and took hold of my arm. "You must have heard of some of the stories," he said.

I couldn't look at the man but stared out the window. The grounds beyond were breathtaking. In the far distance, the sun was setting, the sky painted in lavenders and blues with hues of oranges and yellows near the water. Closer to us were a dozen white buildings, but they were interspersed with lots of greenery, including trees and flowers and grass. What made the scene most beautiful though, were the angels. They flew everywhere. Some soared while others dipped and weaved. Each angel's wings were slightly different, unique to them, and they filled the sky and the area below with beautiful colors. I tried to recall ever learning about the Devil having a twin brother. “I don’t think so,” I finally said.

“Well, then your education is highly lacking. Wrythe should be ashamed of himself.” He glanced over at me, putting his hands behind his back.

I didn’t appreciate him speaking about Wrythe so disrespectfully. In the last year, Wrythe and I had several discussions about changing the new trainees' curriculum. Adjustments were happening, but it was a slow process. “I learned what was necessary.”

“I disagree,” he snapped. “You don’t even know the story of how the Devil came to be.” He went around his desk to a sideboard and poured himself a drink. Then offered me one.

If it were more of that water, I was interested but shook my head anyway out of spite. “Then tell me,” I returned. “Tell me all of it. That’s why I’m here to learn what it means to be an angel. If that includes the story of how the Devil became the Devil, then I’m ready to listen.” Everything about this angel irked me, which wasn’t all that different than how I felt about my father.

Raphael let out a heavy sigh. “How many years were you in Demonland before becoming a Dark Moth?”

I had a feeling he already knew the answer. “A lot,” I replied through gritted teeth.

“And yet you think I can just sit you down and show you everything about the angel half of yourself in one night?” He went back over to his desk but didn’t sit. Instead, he placed his hands on the slick surface but kept his eyes on me, waiting.

The truth is, that was what I hoped. I already wanted to be done here. “I guess not,” I said. “But I refuse to attend classes. I’m not a child," I said.

"You are still a child. Nineteen is nothing compared to eternity. And you have a lot to learn." He adjusted some papers before dropping them into a white tray. "Classes have ended for the next two months for our regular students. But there is a teacher…" he paused, tilting his head to one side, his eyes roaming over me like he worried about how I would react. "He will be teaching a few students during the break. They come with interesting pasts like you." He sat down and took out a piece of white paper.

Delinquents, I thought. We occasionally had those in Demonland as well. Those few who couldn't get along with others or were continually starting fights and various other reasons. Wrythe would have them be taught separately, always willing to give them a second chance. Usually, they made it too.

Raphael wrote something down. "I think that is exactly where you should be." He smiled for the first time, then tore off the paper and held it out.

"Maybe you aren't hearing me," I said, trying to keep calm, but my demon power was there, ready to strike if necessary. "I will not take any classes."

Raphael kept the smile on his face, but it was easy to see it didn't reach his eyes as he came around to stand directly in front of me. A silver-white power began to ripple around him. He was taller than I was, and he looked down on me like he intended to kill me right then and there. The power oozed from him, and at once, his pearl-white wings appeared. They hovered above and to the sides of him, placing me in the shadow of them.

My demon power wanted to come forth, but it was as though Raphael had somehow dampened it. The other part of me—the angel part of myself roared to life—and I felt it push out of my center. If it was a fight he was after, then so be it. But I didn't know how to use my angelic power, and before it could fully manifest, it fizzled.

“I don’t think you’re hearing me, Alice. You will do as I say. You will attend the classes with the other students until I say otherwise. Do I make myself clear?” He enunciated each word with malice.

I thought he could kill me in a blink at the self-righteous haughtiness rolling off him. Though I didn’t want to cow to this man, I didn’t have a choice. “Yes, I believe you do.” I crossed my arms. Raphael may be an archangel, but it seemed to me that he was exactly like his brother. An evil demon.

“Good.” His wings vanished with a snap, and my insides jumped at the sound. “You’ll go with Deacon down to the front desk,” he went on. “There, you will give this note to Gneth, and he’ll get you set up.” We went back around to the other side of his desk. “That’ll be all.” He waved me away with the flick of a hand. Then sat in his chair and spun around, so he once again looked out the window.

Slowly, I went to the door, thinking that the angels were supposed to possess the opposite of the demons. Where we had wrath, there would be forgiveness. Humility instead of pride. Charity over greed. Kindness in place of envy. Diligence above sloth. Chastity, instead of lust and temperance, took the place of gluttony. In the small amount of time I’d been here, the only kindness I’d seen was from Tillie. Everyone else acted just like the Moths.

“And Alice,” Raphael said as soon as I touched the door handle.

“What?” I glanced back, but he was still facing away from me.

“Live up to your heritage, or you will find yourself stripped of all of your powers and living with the other angel rats before you have the chance to finish the final Trial.” He did turn around then. “I can’t imagine Wrythe would want you then.” His oily smile returned.

Inside I was reeling, primarily since he’d used my word for menial demons against me. Calling the angels without powers rats felt too coincidental. For a quick moment, I wondered if this were real. It made more sense that I was in some sort of elaborate fantasy or dream that the Devil concocted. At the thought, I pinched myself in hopes of waking, but it was no use.

Grinding my teeth, I held my tongue against all of the foul words I wanted to shout at the archangel. Brusquely, I opened the door and closed it softly behind me once I was out in the hall. Relieved, I glanced at the warrior. “You’re Deacon?”

“That’s right,” he said, working not to smirk. Obviously, he’d heard what Raphael said.

“Great, well, I guess I’m supposed to go back down to speak with Gneth.” I kept my voice even though I was nearly boiling with rage.

“Right this way.”

I followed him to the elevator. We rode down in silence. At the desk, I gave Gneth the note. He studied it a moment before disappearing behind the door once again. This time when he returned, it was with a female angel. Her wings were brown, and the tips were red like they’d been dipped in blood. It was a bit off-putting but no more so than the red tinge to her eyes. Her skin was light and covered in freckles, and she had the pinkest lips. Surprisingly, the look wasn’t bad on her. It worked.

“This is Catherine. She will show you where to meet in the morning for your first class and then take you to your room and get you set up with all the necessities.”

“Great. Thank you,” I said, no longer feeling in control of my life.

Gneth didn’t bother with a response and returned to his chair, busying himself with whatever had to be done.

Deacon didn’t bother to say another word before disappearing behind the door.

Catherine came around and gave me a wisp of a smile. “Follow me,” she said.

Rolling my shoulders back, I let her lead me across the main entry area to the back of the building. From there, we went outside. Once again, I found it strange there wasn’t a change in temperature. This was the direction Raphael had been watching, and I wondered if he saw me now. If so, I refused to let him know how he'd gotten to me and how alone I felt and kept my back straight and my head high.

"You'll have your own room since most of the angels are gone for the break," Catherine said. She didn't seem to feel any of the tension I did. "You're so lucky," she added. "I share a room with three other angels, and we're constantly bumping wings or getting on each other's nerves."

I figured she was trying to make me feel better but didn't say anything since luck was not a word I'd use to describe my situation. "I guess so."

Directly in front of us loomed another skyscraper. Catherine veered to the left, heading to a building half the size of the one in the center. "These are the female dormitories, and you'll be on the main floor."

"Do you know anything about my instructor?" I asked, hoping to get prepared for what lay ahead tomorrow.

She shook her head. "Only gossip, which isn't even that much. Until recently, he spent most of his time down in the human realm." Catherine stopped, glancing around to verify we were alone. "How does it feel to be part of the biggest prophecy ever written?"

Not again. "I'm pretty sure it isn't about me," I said, wary. A prophecy conversation didn't thrill me in the slightest. But then again, she might be able to tell me more. "With those things, it could literally be about anyone."

That seemed to please her, and she clasped her hands together. "That was my thought too," she said, a strange smile contorting her sweet face. "Who knows. Maybe it could even be about me." A shadow fell across her face. "Are you hungry?" She shook her head and appeared to be debating something internally.

"Not really," I admitted, and changed the subject. "So, my teacher is chayot, then?" I didn't know much except what I'd learned in the journal Heathcliff gave me.

She shrugged. “Beats me.” She stopped in front of a door and unlocked it by pressing some buttons above the handle. When the lock clicked, she turned. “I will say that while most chayot spend their time in the human realm, from what I’ve heard, that isn’t this guy.” She paused and pushed open the door.

I went inside. The room had four white walls as well as a ceiling and floor. A bed, dresser, closet, and a small bathroom off the entry. Basic. The room reminded me of the one I had in Demonland. The coloring was different, but that was it.

“There are towels and toiletries in the bathroom,” she indicated with one hand. “Your uniforms are hanging in the closet, and underthings are in the drawers.” She looked around the room. “I’ll have some dinner brought to you after I show you where you’ll be meeting tomorrow if that’s alright.”

“Sounds great.” I crossed my arms and waited for her to exit so I could follow.

Her shoulders dropped with relief. “The food here is excellent. Our cook is amazing.”

That was debatable. No one could be better than the cook in Demonland, but I kept that to myself.

Catherine told me the code to get into my dorm room before we left and headed over to the large building in the middle of the dorms. On the way, she explained the structure to the right was the men’s dorms and that all of my classes would be held in the large building we were heading to.

Inside this building was set up the same as the first one with a desk upon entering and an angel behind it doing busy work. This one acknowledged Catherine before we rode the elevator up to the top floor and walked the length of the all-white hall until we reached the door on the other side. She opened it to reveal a set of stairs going up.

“These will take you to the roof, but most angels fly.” Then she glanced at my back and took in my absence of wings.

I forced myself not to get embarrassed. Kade had said there might be hope for me to have a pair of my own, but none had appeared yet. And probably never would.

We took the stairs up to the roof. Catherine was breathing heavily when we exited. She bent over to catch her breath. “I’m not used to all the walking,” she admitted.

Did she want me to apologize? It wasn’t happening. I walked over to the closest edge and was about to glance over when two angels shot up, barely missing me. They were two females, and they were fighting, their power rolling off them as they punched and kicked, slashed and dove. One held a blade in her hand while the other had a whip. Both weapons glowed with their angel power as though they were extensions of the angels themselves.

I watched in awe, thinking it was like a dance until one of them noticed me. “Stop,” she commanded.

Surprisingly, the other obeyed and followed her gaze, so they were both staring me down. The first, an angel with silver hair and wings and eyes to match, flew down until she landed a few feet away.

Catherine flew to my side. “Let’s get out of here,” she said, taking my elbow.

I allowed her to steer me, but the silver-haired angel was suddenly in front of us, a sneer of her face. The other angel with black hair and lavender wings with lime green ends landed beside her. She leaned back, her wings folding. “Look at her, Leia, she has no wings.”

“Another rat for us to play with, Veronica.” She kept her wings spread as though she were trying to scare me.

I crossed my arms. “Sure, I’ll play,” I said, rolling my eyes. If they thought I was nothing more than a lowly rat, they were wrong.

“Oooh, she’s feisty.” Veronica turned her blade as though she intended to cut me.

It was a bit overwhelming. I expected since this was the angel realm for more light, acceptance, well basically goodness. So far, I was feeling none of that. “What’s with all of the hostility?” I asked, unable to help myself. But I was preparing too, my power growing within.

“I’m sorry, Alice,” Catherine whispered. “We’ve had a lot of changes in the realm lately, and most of them haven’t been for the better.” She raised her chin defiantly at Leia and Veronica. “We don’t want any trouble,” she said.

“Shut up, kitty cat. No one cares what you think,” Leia said, shoving Catherine. Then she focused her hostility in my direction. “Alice, huh?” Leia asked like my name meant something to her. “I’ve heard about you. You’re the daughter of the Devil and a Fallen archangel.” She flicked her whip, and there was a crack right beside my head.

In a flash, I grabbed the tip of the whip and wrapped it around my fist. “Don’t do that again,” I hissed, keeping my voice low. I was madder than hell after speaking with Raphael. Not to mention, I didn’t want to be here. So for this jerk to try and start something with me? Well, I wasn’t going to have it.

Veronica lunged for me, but I flung some of my demon power at her, sending her back until she hit the door and fell to the ground. There was a dent, and I felt smug about it. Veronica screamed out in pain and rolled to her knees. One of her wings was at an odd angle. “Make her pay,” she said, still clinging to her little knife.

Leia worked to yank the whip away, but I held on, pressing my demon power down through her whip and into her hand. She yelped, letting go, and I took the opportunity to make the weapon my own.

Before that moment, I hadn’t thought about sending my demon power into my weapon, but since I’d seen them doing it with their angel powers, I decided to give it a try. Deep red power rolled off me and into the whip. I’d tried the weapon once or twice and was adept. It just had never been my weapon of choice. Now though… I cracked it.

Leia stepped back, fear in her eyes.

Catherine stood off to my left, unsure of what to do.

And Veronica moaned, obviously still in pain. “When I heal,” she began.

I snapped the whip again, cutting her off.

“Alice, that is enough!”

OceanofPDF.com

HIS VOICE CAME FROM BEHIND, and I froze as familiarity rolled through my veins. But that was impossible. He was dead.

Slowly, I turned, unsure what I would see. But it was as I suspected. Kade was there, flying toward me. “Are you real?” I asked, dropping the whip. My demon power was forgotten and dissolved, replaced by disbelief. How was it possible? For the second trial, I chose for Kade to die. Yet, there he was.

It felt like I was turned inside out. My breathing became rapid, and I fought to catch my breath. Everything I believed over the last year, all the pain I suffered, and the guilt I harbored… it’d been for nothing.

Because Kade was alive!

He landed without a sound looking as gloriously handsome as ever. Longish blond hair whipped around his head. Eyes green as emeralds were surrounded by long dark lashes. His white wings were still tinged with green, the same color as his eyes. They beat lightly behind him. “As real as you are,” he said, his head tilted to one side like he questioned my sanity.

As soon as his feet touched the ground, I forgot about everything else and ran to him, flinging my arms around his neck. “I can’t believe it.” Tears filled my eyes and fell onto his white shirt. “You’re here. You’re really here.” I held him tight, enjoying the cinnamon scent of him as all of my tamped down love and need broke through the barrier and rushed out.

Instead of returning my embrace, Kade stood there stiffly, without moving.

I missed you so much, I said into his mind.

There was no response.

“Kade?” I pushed back so I could see his face. “What’s the matter? Are you mad I chose you instead of Wrythe?” But that’s what he wanted me to do. He had specifically said I must choose him.

Extricating himself from my grasp, he adjusted his shirt, wiping at it like I dirtied him. “You would do well to keep your distance, Alice,” he said quietly. “Physical contact of that nature between student and teacher is not permitted.” His eyes bore into mine like I already failed my first test somehow. Or worse, he’d put me on his crap list.

One of the girls laughed, but I ignored her as pain radiated through my veins like electricity. Kade, I tried again.

Stay out of my mind, demon girl, he returned. His jaw clenched like he could physically stop my efforts.

All of the fire, the anger, and the arrogance went out. My shoulders rolled in, and my soul curled up on itself. Because either Kade was too angry with my choice or he honestly didn’t remember who I was. Both possibilities hurt beyond what I thought I could handle.

“And just because you have demon power doesn’t mean you should use it,” he said, his features changing momentarily to disgust. Then he walked over to Veronica and began speaking with her.

I was in shock. “Are you really Kade?” Raphael looked like my father. Was it possible Kade had a twin as well? The words came out sounding as hurt as I felt. Sure, I was with Wrythe now, but Kade and I shared a bond. At least we used to.

He glanced back. “That’s Professor or Professor Everett to you,” he said. “And of course I am. Who else would I be?” He went back to speak with Veronica.

My emotions were a swirling vortex of confusion. On the one hand, I was happy to see that he was actually alive and well. On the other, he didn’t remember me. How was that possible? “You don’t remember we met outside an Arizona club while fighting demons?” As I spoke, a white light emitted from Kade’s hands and into Veronica’s wounded wings. There were crystal tears in the girl's eyes, but she was still shooting daggers in my direction.

Catherine kept looking from me to Kade and back again, unsure what she should be doing.

And Leia? She'd collected her whip and had it wrapped around her waist like a belt. Smug. That was the only word to describe her. She watched our interchange with glee and intended to use it against me whenever she had the chance.

"And what about at the Mexican restaurant? When I killed the second royal demon after the Trials? You remember that?" My heart raced in my chest, desperate for some indication he knew what I was talking about. But I knew the answer. Somehow when I chose Kade to die in the second trial, he hadn't died, but his memories of me had been erased. And he was different.

"Alice," he said, standing and helping Veronica to her feet as well. "I don't know what you're talking about." Kade shook his head. "Raphael said you would be a difficult student." He raised an eyebrow. "And that you were a little bit mad, but I thought he was overexaggerating." His eyes rested on me, and for the briefest moment, I thought there was a flash of recognition. "Normally, I don't make judgments until I've spent some time with the student, but it turns out, he might be right."

"No," I said, my hands out, pleading. I didn't care that I was making a spectacle of myself. My pride be damned. I needed him to remember me. "I loved you, and you loved me."

At that, Kade's looks of pity changed to anger. "I don't know what you're playing at, but either you stop this nonsense, or I will have to tell Raphael I cannot teach you." He led Veronica over to the edge of the building. Leia went with them, but her eyes never left mine.

I swallowed, wishing I was back in Demonland with Wrythe and Styx and Daya and Wendy. "Sorry," I said, forcing myself to sound contrite. "I must have you mixed up with someone else." I shoved down my feelings and stomped on them. No more showing weakness in front of these angels. “You’re going to be my teacher, then?”

“If you’re done with this nonsense and willing to make an effort,” he said, and his face softened. “Then yes, I’ll be your teacher along with Veronica’s and Leia’s as well as two more.” He put his hands on his hips.

Leia and Veronica shared a look.

Double crap! “I look forward to being taught by you,” I said.

He didn’t seem convinced but didn’t voice that feeling. “Return to your rooms. All of you. We will meet up here at eight in the morning.” He took to the air. “Don’t be late.” The last part, he said, looking only at me.

“Can’t wait,” I said, cringing internally.

Whatever Kade did to Veronica’s hurt wing, it was better, and she took to the sky, same as Leia. When they were gone, Catherine came over. “Come on, I’ll show you where the cafeteria is on the way to your room.” I was about to tell her I didn’t want to eat there, but she went on. “I’ll have some food sent over,” she added.

I breathed a heavy sigh of relief. “Thank you, Catherine.” As I went down the stairs to the elevator and rode down to the main floor, I couldn’t help thinking about my interaction with Kade. At the thought of him being alive, I would get a thrill of excitement. The next moment my heart would break because he didn’t remember me.

The cafeteria was on the main floor on the opposite side of the main entrance, in the direction of the male dorms. It was an enormous room with an enormously high ceiling made wholly of glass. After Catherine told me the times for breakfast, lunch, and dinner, she walked me back to my room.

“Sorry,” I said, feeling like I should apologize. “I thought I knew him.” I gritted my teeth together. “Obviously I made a mistake.”

“That happens to all of us sometimes,” she said and patted me on the arm. “I’m sorry too. Those girls… I’m older than they are, but they're just so mean." She shook her head. "I don't like them, nor do I know how to handle them."

I appreciated her honesty. "Thank you for being kind and for all of your help." Recalling the code, I pressed it into the pad, and the lock clicked open.

"Of course." She smiled. "I'll see you around, I'm sure." She started back down the hall.

"We will?" I asked, hopeful before going in.

"Sure. I'm working here for the summer."

Inside, I pushed until the lock clicked, but didn't move. It felt like I hadn't made any progress at all. Like the last year and a half had been for nothing. Sure, I was in a new place—the angel realm. And I had the opportunity to learn how to use that part of myself, which should've been great, but all I felt was sad.

Homesick.

"Wrythe," I whispered.

OceanofPDF.com

AFTER CLOSING the curtains on the window that overlooked the common area outside, I showered and changed into white shorts and a tank top. On the bedside table sat a book titled: Angels 101. I flipped through the pages sending the scent of daisies wafting through the air. I decided I might as well start reading.

In the beginning, the book began, and I sighed. I so wasn't in the mood, but according to my father, it had to be done. So I read and read and read until someone knocked on my door.

Thrilled at the possibility of a distraction, I ran over and peeked out. A silver cart with a tray of food and a glass of clear liquid sat on top. Glancing both ways to thank whoever brought it, I saw the blip of a white angel wing with green edges before it disappeared around the corner. My pulse quickened. "Kade," I called out softly.

He didn't appear.

Schooling my desires, I lifted the tray off the cart and took it inside my room. The plate was filled with bright fruits and vegetables, though I couldn't place any of them. Each bite I put in my mouth was like what I thought joy might taste like. I didn't stop until my plate was clean. The liquid was more of the water Tillie had given me to drink when I first arrived. Once again, when I finished, I longed for more.

With my belly full, I returned the tray to the cart and debated whether I should leave it or return it to the cafeteria. I wasn't necessarily dressed for being out in public but shrugged it off. Mostly everyone was gone anyway.

Barefoot, I wheeled the tray down the hall and out of the girl's dormitory.

Though the sun had set and it was obviously nighttime, there was an abundance of light in the sky thanks to a full moon and billions upon billions of stars. I had always believed the night sky in Arizona was a sight to behold, but this. This was indescribable in all of its glory. I found myself mesmerized and couldn't look away until my neck started to hurt.

Effortlessly following the path, I made my way to the front door. It was easy to see through the glass doors that no one was at the front desk, and all of the lights were out. It occurred to me the building might be locked, but when I got close enough, the doors slid open, and I walked in. The cafeteria was to the right, and I went that way until I saw the swinging double doors. Pushing the cart through them, I stopped just inside and was surprised to note that it was beyond dark. Regardless of the time of day, there was always a light on in the cafeteria in Demonland. Without light, I stopped, giving my eyes time to adjust since I wasn't familiar enough with the layout to know where I was headed.

Several long moments later, I could make out the tables and chairs' shapes and walked toward the door I believed would lead me to the kitchen. As I wound my way through the sitting area, I debated what Kade would teach us tomorrow and how long I would have to remain in the realm. During my shower and while I got ready, I decided it was better Kade didn't remember me. That meant I was able to entirely give my heart to Wrythe without feeling guilty. And once I returned to Demonland, my king would reap the benefit of my newfound relief.

Before I reached the kitchen door, I heard voices coming from that direction and froze. Two males spoke, and I strained to hear, knowing full well if they turned on the lights they would see me. Part of me wanted to leave the cart and make a run for it, but something told me not to go, but to listen. So, I did leave the tray and carefully snuck closer to the voices so I could understand what they were saying.

"…make sure she dies. I don't believe what the others are saying about the prophecy. It could be any one of us as well as her. She is a disgrace to the angelic race, and the sooner she is no longer taking up space in the universe, the better," one voice said.

Instantly, I knew it was Raphael and that he was talking about me. The archangel wanted me dead. How very un-angel like, not that this place was anything like what I imagined it would be.

"But what if she is the one the prophecy is speaking of? If she dies, that will be to our detriment."

Kade's voice! At least he didn't want to kill me.

"It's all lies meant to keep us down and at war with one another. The prophecy hasn't come to pass in a thousand years. And this girl?" Raphael scoffed. "Even if the prophecy is real, she isn't the one."

"I'm sure you're right, and if that's the case, then she'll fail on her own merits without the need for such drastic measures," Kade said.

"She doesn't deserve to live, but don't underestimate her. Your memories of her were wiped, but hear me when I tell you she won your heart once already. Given time, I have a feeling she might do it again." Raphael sounded so condescending, I wanted to punch him in the face.

"So you say, but I have a hard time believing it. She's so…" Kade paused, and I found myself gripping my hands into tight fists. "Demonic," he finally finished. "Not my type at all. Besides, I'm taken, and we are to unite on the eve of the next full moon."

Raphael chuckled. "That's right. I meant to congratulate you and Mari. That said, watch out. While we may be angels, we all still possess weaknesses. Alice was yours, and she nearly cost you your wings."

Green light suddenly caught my attention, and I realized my demon powers were skittering along my skin. Weakness! The archangel called me a weakness. I'd show him weakness. Even as I flung the thoughts through my head, I knew that wasn't why my powers had erupted. It was envy. Kade was engaged to be married.

So are you, I thought, but that didn't help.

“I guess,” Kade said. “What would you have me do?”

“Well, I certainly don’t want to tell you how to do your job, but if it were me, I would take her and the others out on a teaching mission to Lava Falls.”

“That’s a dangerous place for angels, and Alice doesn’t even have wings. How would we get there?” Kade sounded irritated.

“Oh, she has wings. I sensed them. First thing in the morning—”

At Raphael’s words, I jerked and banged into the tray, knocking the fork to the ground. “Crap.” Without a backward glance, I sped back the way I came and hurried out of the main building and into the girl’s dorm. Once I was in my room, I leaned against the door, breathing heavily. My mind whirred at all I’d heard.

Raphael wanted me dead. Well, he could join the crowd.

And, he said I had wings.

After turning the lock, I climbed into bed and lay there for hours deliberating over my options. At one point, I hadn’t believed I could be killed except by my father. He could snuff me out of existence with the clap of his hands. It stood to reason an archangel had at least the same amount of power. That reasoning led to questions. If Raphael wanted me dead, why make Kade do it or go through the trouble of having me participate in a teaching mission? Why not just get it over with?

The longer I debated the archangel’s reasons, the clearer my thoughts became. Angels. Demons. They were a lot alike. Sure, demons had their games, but so did the angels. Since I was half demon and half angel, I was lucky enough to be caught up in both worlds.

That knowledge burned through my soul. I was tired of being a pawn in other creatures' games. By the time I fell into a fitful sleep, my destiny had become apparent. No one was going to kill me. Not Kade. Definitely not Raphael. And certainly not my father. I would figure out what it meant to be an angel, and then I would return to Wrythe and the love we had and never give the angelic part of myself another thought.

In a small recess of my mind came the thought that was exactly what the Devil wanted. I shoved it aside, knowing that I could be the Queen of the Dark Moths without giving in completely to the demon half of myself.

OceanofPDF.com

THE NEXT MORNING, I quickly dressed in my white uniform, thankful my favorite blade, and the demon orb traveled with me into the angel realm. Tucking those in my right boot, I jogged over to the main building and made it up to the roof before the others. Even Kade hadn't arrived yet. While I waited, I casually peered over the edge of the all-white and glass building. I was so high above the ground, it made me dizzy.

"Ready to fly?"

The words startled me, but that wasn't the half of it. With the question came his hands shoving me over the edge. Before I could wrap my brain around it, I was falling, the ground coming at me fast.

My arms and legs flailed as I fought uselessly to stop myself.

"Let go of your fears and allow yourself to fly."

I decided if I lived, I would kill Kade. But as the ground got closer, I wondered if it were possible to survive such a fall.

Ten feet.

Five feet.

I closed my eyes and braced myself, but my body never struck.

Carefully, I peeled my eyes open and was surprised to note I was hovering a foot off the ground. So close, I could see a white spider making its way through the lush green grass. A light wind brushed against my hair, and I glanced back and let out a squeal.

Wings beat at my back. They were golden near my body and lightened to white at the tips, except the very edges which were blue like my eyes. As though I accidentally dipped them in sky blue ink.

"I do have wings." A gurgle of excitement out of my throat. Even though I couldn't stand Raphael, he told the truth. I tried to touch them while still in the air and immediately regretted my decision as I spun a moment before floundering forward, landing face-first on the cobblestone path. That was going to leave a mark. Good thing, I healed quickly.

Behind me came a deep rumble of laughter. “Very graceful,” he said.

My face got hot as I jumped to my feet and whirled around. “You pushed me,” I spat, charging Kade. It still surprised me how easily my body reacted to him. All I wanted to do was hold him, but I fought against that. The Kade I knew was no more. This guy dared to shove me off a freaking building. The Kade I knew would never have done that. I got in his face determined to push him, but he sidestepped me easily, using his wings to sail out of my reach.

“It was necessary.” He landed a few feet away. “And look at your wings. They’re amazing.”

At the look on his face, I settled. Because at that moment, he looked like the Kade I knew and loved. But as soon as it was there, it vanished. “You could’ve warned me first,” I said flatly. “That would’ve been the polite thing to do.”

“Think you can fly up to the top of the building?” he asked, ignoring my comment.

“I can try,” I replied, unsure how to make them go. But I looked up and thought about reaching the top of the building. And before I knew it, my feet were off the ground. “I’m flying.” For some reason, a vision of Abernathy came to mind. Flying with him had been exciting. He’d told me everything wasn’t as it seemed, and he’d been right.

Part of me wanted to look back and witness my wings beating at my back, but I worried that I would send myself spiraling again and didn’t want that to happen. Instead, I caught my reflection in the shiny white walls interspersed with the windows and saw a glimpse of what I looked like. My wings stood out against my back in the reflection of the glass. They were amazing.

Once I reached the top, I had another issue. How to land. Veronica, Leia, and two guys were there, watching me like a was a bizarre attraction at the circus.

Kade landed in front of them but turned to face me. “You’re doing great,” he said. “Think about your landing.”

Did I detect a hint of worry in his expression? Probably not. I tried to slow, but kept going, and knew before it happened that I would run right into Kade. My feet kicked into his chest, and he let out a groan but held on, and I dropped, sending him and me to the ground, so I was on top of him. Working to untangle myself and my wings, I pushed off his chest but caught hold of his gaze.

His green eyes were so intense. I glanced at his lips, licking mine as they twitched with need. His cinnamon scent filled the air around us. I was dazzled by him. And then I remembered Wrythe and quickly stood, before falling back, sitting on my wings. I winced and wanted to cry out in pain. Instead, I bit the inside of my cheek to keep from doing so in front of strangers and Kade.

Veronica, Leia, and the guys were laughing, and I couldn’t blame them. I probably looked like an idiot. More than that, they were in shock. Was it because my wings appeared? I figured that was it.

“Quiet,” Kade barked and stood before coming over and putting out his hand. “That was a good first try,” he said when I took hold of his grasp. At our touch, there was a physical and emotional spark. I flinched again, yanking my hand from his and getting myself to my feet on my own.

He glanced at his hand before turning away, focusing on the other students. “Today, you’ll be teamed in groups of two. Veronica and Thomas. Leia and Jax.”

That left me a loner, but that was fine. Whatever. School sucked! It was another reminder that I didn’t want to be in this place.

“Alice and I will be paired together,” Kade said, interrupting my thoughts.

My heart hammered inside my chest. Great, I shouted internally, trying to be sarcastic, but my body hummed with enthusiasm.

It will be, he responded.

I glanced over, but he wasn't looking my way. He was focused on the other four students. "I'm going to present you with a challenge. You will be given a slip of paper. On it will be your first clue. The team to get back here with the item you are hunting wins a prize."

"If you and Alice are a team, that isn't fair," Leia snapped, her eyes wary as she studied my wings.

"Yeah," Veronica added.

The guys nodded their agreement but didn't speak. I had yet to hear two words from them, which I found strange. I studied the two of them. Thomas was tall and rail-thin with hair the same fawn brown as his wings. Except at the ends, which were freckled brown and white. His eyes thankfully were brown, though they were the palest shade I'd ever seen, almost taupe.

Jax's skin was dark and he had cream wings with orange tips. His hair was cut close to his head, and he had one orange eye color, and the other was blue. I found that very interesting and wanted to know his story.

When he noticed me staring, he smiled, showing off very straight and very white teeth.

I smiled back. Maybe I had a friend in the group, after all.

Then I remembered Kade and Raphael's conversation, and my smile vanished. The archangel wanted Kade to take us to Lava Falls, but Kade said it was too dangerous. Perhaps he intended only to take me there.

"Alice just got her wings. She and I will not be participating in the challenge." He smiled, giving each of them an inspiring look. "You'll be going against each other."

At those words, the attitude of the girls changed, and excitement buzzed between them.

“What’s the prize?” Veronica asked.

I watched Kade’s jaw clench and unclench. “It’s a surprise.” He took two slips of paper from one pocket and hand one to Veronica and the other to Jax before lifting his arms high above his head.

They quickly unfolded the paper and read it, whispering to their team member. It was nice that they weren’t focused on me.

“On your mark. Get set. Go.” Kade dropped his arms.

The four of them ran to the edge of the building and jumped into the air.

I watched them fly briefly, thinking how cool it was. I might be half-demon at heart, but my wings… well, that was a bonus and certainly a part of myself I wouldn’t give up. I thought about what Wrythe would say when he saw them. He would like them, wouldn’t he?

“What are you thinking about?” Kade asked, suddenly beside me.

We were so close, his arm brushed against mine.

I forced myself not to react. “Nothing,” I said. Then added, “I’m not opposed to my wings if I can figure out how to use them without making a fool of myself.”

He bumped into me a soft smile on his lips. “I swear your first time flying was better than mine.”

I looked over, trying to figure him out. At that moment, he almost reminded me of the Kade I fell in love with. “Maybe, but you were probably five when you learned. I’m nineteen.”

“Three, but yeah, I guess that’s true.” He chuckled, and the smile he gave me pierced deep into my heart.

What was happening? Raphael told him he wanted me dead. Kade’s sudden kindness was throwing me off. Sort of like how the guards are super nice and accommodating to death row inmates on the day of their scheduled expiration date. Is that what he was doing? I gritted my teeth. I wouldn’t make it easy on him.

Refusing to give him the satisfaction of killing me on his terms, I took off running until I reached the edge of the building and jumped, hoping my wings would know what to do. Rather quickly, I knew what I'd done was a bad idea. I was falling, and my wings were of no help. They hung above me like a broken parachute.

I glanced up as Kade jumped from the roof, his wings out at his sides briefly before folding them against his back and angled toward me like a bullet in a gun. His face was a mask of intensity until he caught me in his arms just as his wings popped out behind him, and we were no longer falling but floating.

Don't you ever do that again, he said into my mind. His angry eyes held mine captive. I couldn't even breathe.

"You're going to kill me anyway, aren't you?" I asked softly, and I looked away, staring at my hands.

Where did you get that idea? Again he spoke into my mind.

I heard you and Raphael talking in the cafeteria last night. He doesn't believe I'm the one from the prophecy, not that I blame him. But I do take offense that he wants me killed. I figured Kade would take us to the roof again to give me instructions about flying without falling. Instead, he lifted us higher into the air, and we flew languidly over the school grounds toward the fence.

Raphael is arrogant and has systematically turned the Seraph Academy against those angels who are different. More than once, since I became a teacher, I've complained about how he encourages mistreatment. After last night, I couldn't take his insolence another moment and reported him. A smile spread over his face. When they learned he wanted you killed, they immediately had Raphael removed from his position at the school and made me the new headmaster. Only his secretary knows of the changes. But the higher-ups intend to announce it to the whole realm sometime today.

I appreciated his willingness to stand up for the underdogs, but we were getting closer to the fence, and I started to worry. "Won't we be incinerated?" I asked, pointing at the sky in front of us. We were only ten feet away from what I guessed was an invisible forcefield of some kind.

"Now that the Seraph Academy is on break, the protective powers have been dropped." He tore his gaze from mine and focused ahead.

"Thank you," I whispered, gazing up at his face.

"For what?" he asked, confused.

"Saving me from myself," I admitted, thinking how stupid it was that I just jumped off the building like that. I mean, I probably wouldn't have died, but the repairs to my body would've taken time.

"You're welcome." He didn't elaborate, nor did he speak, just continued in a straight line, heading where I had no idea.

More than once, I wanted to ask our destination, but each time I went to open my mouth, I changed my mind. From the air, I could see a thick overgrowth of trees. The tops ranged in shades and colors from ruby red to midnight blue and sunflower yellow to sherbet orange. But that wasn't what was so unusual. It was that the trees grew in a tight, straight line. Kade flew along the tops of them as though they were the shaft of an arrow, directing us where to go.

"How come the trees grow in such a straight line?" I added, thinking maybe it was because we were in the angelic realm, and everything was perfect. Though as soon as I thought it, I knew that wasn't true.

"They are a hologram, surrounding an electrical barrier used to keep the different classes of angels from crossing into the other's lands," he admitted.

"Oh," was all I said. I'd read about the different classes. There were four. The Fallen were angels who, for whatever reason, had their powers stripped from them. Their job in the realm was to serve the other angels in any capacity. Many had jobs just like humans did and worked for wages. This would've been where my mom dwelled if she lived in the angel realm. I doubted they would let her, though, since she was still a vampire, not that she would want to. Professor Pops wasn't here. Next was the Chayot. They were angels given the task of guarding the human race and protecting them from supernaturals. Many lived here during their training, and once they were retired. Then there was the Protestas. These were the most interesting. They held similar positions to the Tracker demons. Considered mid-level angels, they were the realm's warriors and called upon to protect, teach, and fight for light and good. At least that was what the book said. Finally, there were archangels. All it had said about them was that they were royalty in the angel realm. I took that to mean they did whatever they wanted, the same as the royal demons did.

"There are four holographic forests just as there are four entries into the realm, four entries into the academy and four Welcome Stations for when an angel crosses over," Kade went on, shaking me from my thoughts.

I couldn't help but snort. Since arriving in this realm, most I met were anything but welcoming.

He glanced at me, but I didn't meet his eyes, choosing to focus on what lay ahead and enjoy the wind in my hair and the warmth from the sun on my face. "I know you're not one of the Fallen since you have your angelic power. And I know you aren't a Chayot either. That leaves either a Protestas or Archangel, but which one?" I asked. I was guessing Protestas but wasn't sure.

He didn't respond right away, and that was okay. I waited patiently, checking out the landscape below. On either side of the hologram were more buildings. All of them were similar to those in the academy—exponentially tall and white with glass. However, I noted that the ones on the left of us were more dreary and dilapidated, much of the glass missing from the buildings.

"You did some reading," he said and winked.

"Protestas are considered mid-level angels, right?"

He smiled. "That's right, and that's what I am…" He let his voice trail off. “Or it was until last night. Now, I guess I’m considered an archangel, same as you.”

I didn’t have a good response. He was saying I was an archangel because that’s what my mom was when she was the angel of death. “Congrats, I guess,” I finally said.

He didn’t respond but continued flying. More than once, I thought about telling him to put me down but decided against it since I didn’t know where we were going, and my flying still left a lot to be desired. Falling into an electric barrier didn’t sound pleasant but would undoubtedly be my fate if left on my own. I needed instruction first.

In the distance were several waterfalls. Some were large and roared over the edge of the jagged cliff while the smaller ones trickled down more lazily.

This wasn’t Lava Falls, and I was grateful. My guess was this was where the angels retrieved their water. This was the Rymi Cascades.

He flew us up above the most significant fall and then landed on a grassy area. “Ready to learn how to fly?”

OceanofPDF.com

"DEPENDS," I said, taking a moment to get my equilibrium back and literally ruffling my feathers. I didn't even know how I was doing it. Like my body just somehow naturally knew they needed to be fluffed.

Kade chuckled. "On what?" He tucked his wings onto his back.

I crossed my arms. "Whether you intend to push me off the edge or show me how these blasted things work," I said, touching one of my wings. They were so soft, the feathers like that of a blanket.

"I'm not going to push you off," he said, stepping into my space and uncrossing my arms.

At his touch, I felt another punch of energy and hitched my breath.

He must've felt it too because he pulled back. I relaxed, looking past him to our surroundings where flowed a river probably twenty feet across in width. Trees grew along the edges, some large and others looking new. As I followed the water with my gaze, I saw it disappeared into the fog. Squinting, I worked to see what lay beyond, but it was too thick.

"Is this the Rymi Cascades?" I asked, turning my focus back to him.

"It is, but where did you hear the name?"

I couldn't tell whether he was surprised or upset, and I blinked several times to get a handle on myself. "Tillie told me that's where the water for this realm comes from." I shrugged, hoping I wasn't getting her into trouble.

My answer seemed to satisfy him. "You're correct. This is the Falls. And it's true, our water comes from here but more than that, this is the spot where we teach our fledglings to fly. It's considered a sacred place. You should be honored to be here."

Okay? I hadn't asked him to bring me here. There was no sense mentioning that, though. Kade was the new headmaster, after all. "I absolutely do," I said, re-crossing my arms.

"Good. Let's get to your first lesson." He spread out his arms as well as his wings. The tips went beyond the length of his arms and kept going until each wing more than doubled the expanse of his arms. They were massive. Before that moment, I hadn't realized just how big they were. "Now, I want you to do the same. Stretch out your wings as far as they can go. It helps for some fledglings to stretch out their arms first like this. Usually, their wings will naturally follow."

"Got it." I extended my arms as Kade watched.

"Keep going and reach your fingers like you're trying to grab something beyond your grasp." He walked around to my back so I could no longer see him, but I did as he said.

"Like this?" I pretended to be reaching for Wrythe, and a blast of sorrow filled my breast.

"That's right," he said.

But nothing was happening. My blasted wings remained flat against my back. I tried again, gritting my teeth with my will. One of my wings twitched and then the other, but didn't move beyond that. "What am I doing wrong?" I asked, feeling frustrated, dropping my hands to my sides.

"Nothing. Your wings have been dormant for your whole life. They just need a little encouragement. Do you mind if I touch them?"

I glanced over my shoulder and licked my lips, remembering when he touched my back at the spots where my wings should be. The feeling had been sensual.

But now things were different.

Kade didn't even know who I was or that I loved him, and he loved me.

"Go ahead," I said and swallowed, preparing for what his touch would do to my body.

He ran his fingers along the top of one, stretching it as he went.

There was no desire. No hot need. And I was surprised. It did feel good, but not like before. I didn't know whether to be disappointed or relieved. Truthfully, I felt a bit of both. And as I accepted the knowledge and sank into my feelings, something happened. My wings began to open.

Slowly at first.

Kade continued to trail his fingers along the one wing, but he was no longer pulling. I was doing it all by myself. When they were fully stretched, I felt different. A shiver of change rushed from the top of my head down to my toes. For the first time wholly myself. As much as I hated to admit it, my dad was right. There was a part of me I wasn't entirely aware of. But being an angel was a part of me, and it was important I nurtured it regardless.

As I focused on the feelings within, they intensified.

"Very good," Kade said, but he sounded far away.

My emotions grew more potent, like spreading my wings fully had allowed the angel power to spread through me as well. It'd been closed off all this time, but like a broken dam, it rushed through me, golden liquid filling my veins. I shivered again and felt the marks on my hands burn white-hot.

A quick glance at them showed me they had changed from black to gold. How odd, I thought.

"Relax, Alice." Kade was in front of me once again, lifting my chin so he could meet my eyes. "Deep breaths."

I wanted to relax and breathe. I really did, but now that the angelic part of myself had been freed, I didn't know how to control it, and the golden-white in my veins suddenly burst from my body, like I was a flashlight that had just been turned on. It pulsed out of me and into Kade.

He was sent flying backward as though a wrecking ball swung into him. Into the mist, he went. I wanted to be scared and feel worried about Kade, but all I felt was joy, strength, and peace. I glanced at myself, feeling like I could do anything and would be unstoppable.

After a few moments, I relaxed slightly, and the light dimmed.

My feet lifted off the ground, and I circled several times before feeling confident enough to fly off the cliff's edge. I went over and peeked at the raging waterfall. It roared like it was angry at something, and I couldn't for the life of me decide what it had to be upset about.

"Alice," Kade shouted.

I spun around just as he dove into me.

Surprised, I grabbed hold of him.

His eyes grew, and for a moment, he looked like he was in pain or scared. "I've got you," he said.

The dimming light flared to life, more reliable than before, and I thought that perhaps the sun was an angel unable to control her power. I didn't believe the energy within would ever subside, but then he leaned in and kissed me.

And everything went quiet.

The light faded back into my soul, and it was just Kade and me.

I kissed him back with all of the hurt and sadness and fear and guilt and… the love I had for him. There was gratitude too. That he was alive and that I was in his arms. Now everything would be okay.

Too soon, he released me. Though I was sad that his lips were no longer on mine, I was also beyond happy. "Kade," I said his name softly, studying his emerald green eyes.

Instead of seeing love or even recognition, there was only relief. "I'm sorry," he said. "But it was the only thing I could think to do." He flew me over to the grassy cliff where we'd started from and let me go.

“You still don’t remember me, do you?” The pain cut through my heart like a knife, and I looked away, desperate to leave this place and return to Wrythe and Demonland. At least there, I knew who my friends were, and I felt loved.

“I do,” he said as he walked over to the edge and peered over.

Had I heard him correctly? “You remember me and our time in Demonland?” I couldn’t believe it. Because if he remembered, then why wasn’t he treating me so indifferently?

“I shouldn’t, but yes, I remember everything.” Kade shoved his hands into the front pockets of his white pants. “The first time we met. The way your lips touched mine when we kissed. The way you felt in my arms…” His voice trailed off. “Last night,” he went on. “It all came back to me.” He turned so he could see my eyes. “The first and second Trials. That you chose for me to be the one to die.” He squeezed his eyes shut.

My heart was going to beat out of my chest. “I… didn’t know what else to do,” I finally said.

“You were in a horrible predicament.” He glanced down at his hands. “And you can see, I didn’t die, though apparently my memory of our time together was wiped until recently.” He shook his head, letting out a bitter laugh. “In some ways, I was better off not knowing how much I loved you.”

“I loved you too,” I admitted, dropping to the ground in front of him.

He landed as well, and we were so close I could smell his cinnamon scent. “Loved?” he asked his hands on my arms.

“Love,” I corrected. I couldn’t deny it. My love for him had been pushed aside because I believed him dead. Now that he remembered me? My love for him rushed through my heart.

He kissed me again, this time with such hunger, it was like our bodies became one. As before, there was no deciphering where I ended, and he began. I wrapped my arms around his hips and pulled him against me. He groaned, his fingers tangling in my hair and down my back to the place where my wings protruded. And I shuddered, biting his bottom lip eagerly.

“My sweet Alice,” he whispered against my mouth. “But…” His voice trailed off.

I knew why. My freaking brain went rational too. Kade was engaged. More than that so was I. And I loved Wrythe too. Desperately.

Kade noticed the way my body stiffened, and his hands went lax. “I’m engaged,” he said and stepped back off the cliff, his wings holding him steady.

This time I felt relief in his absence. Now I could think straight. “Me too,” I said, clasping my fingers together into one fist so I wouldn’t run over and kiss him again.

“Wrythe,” he said, his teeth clenched.

“Mari,” I returned, trying to keep my knees from shaking.

Kade exhaled sharply, crossing his arms, so his muscles flexed. “Not to mention, you’re a student at the Seraph Academy, and I am the new headmaster. Our being together would not be accepted in any way.”

“And I can’t hurt Wrythe. I love him too much.” I lifted into the air and turned, desperate for more distance between Kade and me. I flew quickly along the bank of the river until I reached the mist.

Kade had followed me. “You loved him even when we were together, didn’t you?”

I dropped my head to my chest. “Yes,” I admitted. “Though it was different, more like the way I loved a friend.” I didn’t tell him about seeing my future with Wrythe. It had been that continual vision that allowed my feelings to shift into the kind of love I felt for him now. I turned and studied Kade.

“Was?” he asked, and I saw the hurt there.

I wanted to say something that would make us both feel better, but I couldn't think of anything, so I just nodded. "I'm in love with Wrythe."

He licked his lips and reached out to take my hands. "And I love Mari." He looked over my shoulder a moment. "Let's have this one day together. You and me, and no one else. We'll be the couple we were meant to be before everything happened." His eyes found mine. "When the sun goes down tonight, that will be it. We're over. And we will go back to teacher and student. Two people engaged and in love with other people."

The sane part of my brain said it was a bad idea, but the rest of me was entirely on board, and I flew into his arms, kissing him like he was the very air I breathed.

OceanofPDF.com

OUR NEED for each other accelerated quickly until Kade began to unzip my uniform. A pink hue glittered along my skin as my lust for the angel in front of me intensified.

He studied me, anticipation in his features. “I want you, Alice,” he said, his voice deep and throaty.

At that moment, an image of Wrythe on one knee, proposing filled my mind. His eyes shining with love and hope. I couldn’t do anything that would jeopardize what Wrythe and I had together. One day be damned. I would always know what I did. “I can’t,” I said, placing my hands over Kade’s to halt his progress of removing my clothes.

His other hand caressed my cheek. “Okay,” he said, his eyes on my swollen lips. Without another word, he turned and sprinted until he reached the edge and dove.

“Kade.” I chased after him before using my wings to lift into the air. He was there, near the roaring waterfall, a wicked smile on his face. “Let’s get back. You have the basics of flying down. Not that I had to really teach you anything. You’re a natural.” His smile grew. “Truly remarkable,” he added.

“Thanks,” I said, grateful he wasn’t mad that I'd changed my mind. It wouldn’t have mattered whether he was upset or not. Wrythe was mine now, and I was his. Was I growing as a person? I wanted to think so, but the ache low in my belly begged to differ.

Kade headed toward the straight holographic trees and the electric barrier they housed. I fell in beside him. Why do you think there’s a spark between us? In the air, I felt safe enough to ask the question.

You and I, he began and then stopped.

We are soul mates, I said, understanding flowing over my skin like the air around us.

Yes, that's true in the sense that our souls together create their own kind of magic. But that doesn't mean soul mates are always meant to be together. That's a human fallacy. You love Wrythe?

Yes, I answered without hesitation.

And I love Mari. They complete us in a way that makes us better. They are more than our soul mates; they are our true loves. Because we chose them and they picked us instead of letting a physical attraction or our bodies make the decision. He shook his head. "But the two of us together?" He glanced at me, his eyes filled with fiery desire.

I knew what he meant, and my body responded with a lick of lust as my demon power pushed to be released. Grinding my teeth, I forced it away. "Agreed," I said, glad we didn't take our temptation to the next level. No good would've come of it. "How did you and Mari meet?" I asked, desperate to change the subject.

He blew out his breath, recognizing what I was trying to do. "Funny enough, it was also during a battle."

"Really?" That surprised me for two reasons. The first was the similarities between our meeting and his and Mari's. The second? "There is war in the angel realm?" Angels were supposed to have been created from the seven virtues. War was a demonic issue.

"You might as well find out now since, at some point, you'll be asked to contribute to future missions." Kade peeled to the right.

Though I was confused, I followed. "Find out what?"

"In the last year, a war has raged between the Fallen and the protestas."

I considered his words, understanding better why the Fallen section looked rundown. How could they—without their powers—have a chance against mid-level angels. That would be like the menial demons going against the trackers. "Won't the Fallen be wiped out?" I asked, my eyes taking in the plumes of smoke and broken glass below us.

"You're worried about them?" Kade shook his head. "Your ability to call forth any of the seven virtues is still so remarkable."

If he said so. It was just part of me. I didn't find it remarkable or noteworthy. In Demonland, I was always the weird one.

"Though they don't have powers the way you and I do, they still possess their angel essence. I'm sure you detected something similar in your mother." He tilted his wings down and to the right.

I did the same with my wings. "But what use is the essence?" I thought it was just the residue of having been an angel at one point.

"Nothing, if each Fallen is fighting alone, but if they put their collective essence together, all sorts of consequences can occur."

I didn't like the sound of that. "What could they possibly have to fight about?" Surely having been born of forgiveness, humility, charity, kindness, diligence, chastity, or temperance would predetermine them for peace. Didn't war go against their very natures? "I don't understand," I added.

He gave me a wry smile. "You have all of these fixed beliefs about the angel realm. You probably thought it was all harps playing, choirs singing, and joyous speaking as we sat around eating grapes and talking philosophically?"

"Well, I mean, yeah. Angels are made up of the seven virtues like demons have the seven deadly sins." I thought my hypothesis was logical.

"True, but you've seen for yourself that even demons can choose more than what they were born to be." He raised one eyebrow. "It's the same with angels. More so with the Fallen, but all of us fall prey to the seven deadly sins."

I instinctively knew he was talking about what we'd almost done. Given into our lust and the desires of our flesh. I nodded. "I guess," I said, thinking nothing was ever easy.

"And to your question about why they're fighting. It's simple. Pride. Greed. Sloth. Envy. Wrath. Gluttony. Lust. Those attributes are in the Fallen to a much greater degree than the rest of us, but as you know, even archangels can have those weaknesses." He pursed his lips. "As for this latest fight. It's because the leader of the Fallen, a man named Scott, believes he was robbed when he was stripped of his powers and thinks that if he slaughters enough angels, the higher-ups will take notice and reconsider." He laughed bitterly. "Scott couldn't be more wrong, but he won't listen to reason."

"What happens when an angel dies? I mean, can we die?"

"In a manner of speaking. Angels who suffer the Final Death either in the human realm or in the angel realm become spirits and must dwell Elsewhere and are no longer allowed near Earth."

For some reason, that knowledge caused me to shudder. "But when the Devil killed you, obviously it wasn't the Final Death."

"No, he didn't kill me at all. Just sent me back to the angel realm and had all of my memories of you removed." His jaw flexed like he had more to say on the subject, but didn't have it in him. "I'm sorry," he said.

I let out a quivering breath. "You did the best you could." I swallowed. "So did I. There's nothing to be sorry for." But I couldn't help thinking about what might've happened if he came back for me. Or if I knew he was still alive. Without a doubt, I wouldn't have given my heart to Wrythe. I may have been broken, but the hope would've kept me patient for when Kade and I found each other again.

"Still," he said, and I saw in his eyes he was thinking about the same scenarios running through my head.

But that wasn't how things played out. We both found and fell in love with other people. And I couldn't lessen the adoration I felt for Wrythe. That wasn't fair to him or to me.

A fire just to the right of the electric barrier separating the Fallen from the Protestas caught my attention. Before I could comment on it, there was an explosion.

Kade flew back to make sure I was okay, but I darted around him and headed down toward the danger, hoping no one was hurt, but guessing some were.

“Stop,” Kade shouted, grabbing hold of my arm.

I slowed and turned, using my wings to keep in place. “Someone might be wounded or worse,” I said, as urgency begged me to hurry.

“You’re probably right, but there’s nothing to be done. If you go down there, the Fallen will attack you.” He held out his hands, pleading.

“I don’t care,” I said, and took off, landing near a blackened building with an enormous chunk of the bottom floor missing. Smoke and fire rose up all around me, and for the briefest moment, I thought this felt more like the Devil’s territory than the angel realm.

Painted in bright silver on the side of the building was a set of broken angel wings with the tag: No pity here. Distracted, I tried to imagine what it meant until Kade landed beside me.

He was angry. I saw it on his face. The new headmaster and my one time boyfriend wanted to drag me out of there by my wings.

I ignored him, turning away and began searching the rubble for possible survivors. “Hello?” I called, hoping someone would answer.

To the right, I saw an arm poking out from under a piece of a building. I ran over and felt for a pulse. Heathcliff would've been so proud, and then he’d probably chew me out. I was making bad choices by coming here. I felt it then.

Death and misery everywhere, but it was more than that. A furious animosity hung in the air. I was about to tell Kade he was right and that we should go when a group of four women and three men climbed out of the mangled building. Their faces were masks wrath. There was no kindness or forgiveness anywhere in or on them.

In their hands, they carried various deadly weapons. One held a fist-sized rock in each hand, and another held a long sword. Still, another had a bow and arrow. All of them were aimed at Kade.

He saw them the same time I did and shewed me away with one hand telling me to go, but I'd be damned if I left him. I was constantly getting him into messes. This time, I would make sure he escaped unscathed. No Final Death for him. Not even a scratch.

"What do we have here?" the man asked. He looked like a Dark Moth standing at seven feet tall with dark hair and gray eyes. He had his shoulder-length hair tucked behind his ears and held a longsword in one hand like it weighed nothing. He was also familiar, and I racked my brain, trying to figure out how I recognized him.

Now that I was there, I felt out of place, but I flew over to Kade.

"You are infuriating. I forgot that until this moment," Kade hissed, but didn't look my direction.

"Who's this?" the woman standing beside the man asked, her eyes raking over my wings like she could rip them from my back and claim them for herself.

"My name is Alice," I said, hoping to sound calm. "I saw the explosion and wanted to see if I could help."

The woman whose hair was the color of dried hay laughed. "She wants to help. Isn't that cute, Scott?"

The others joined in her laughter.

"I'll let her help," one of the men said, his eyes raking down my body.

For some reason, comfortable confidence settled into my bones. This, I understood. They were intent on taking my life. I could feel it. Let them try. "I guess we'll be going then," I said, moving to stand in front of Kade.

"Look at her trying to protect him," a woman spat.

Their laughter increased, and Kade rested a hand on my shoulder, but I shrugged him off. It was like I was in the training room once again about to battle the menial demons for a chance to go above ground. As I usually did, I would win this time as well.

A whisper of kindness brushed against the wrath burning just below the surface of my skin. Perhaps I could talk them out of what they intended. “If you don’t require assistance, we will be on our way,” I said, repeating myself.

As soon as I finished speaking, the one holding the bow shot an arrow. As though it happened in slow motion, my demon power shook to life, but with it came the angelic equivalent, which gave me the clarity to see the arrow, if left unchecked, would strike me in between the eyes. She was a good shot. I leaned to one side and grabbed the shaft out of the air.

Shocked, I glanced at it, surprised by my speed. I’d always been faster than regular humans, but these were angels, even if they were Fallen. Before I could really consider what I’d done, another woman plucked a knife from her boot and threw it. As before, time slowed, and I caught it in my other hand. Dropping the arrow, I flipped the blade and aimed it at her. “Stop this instant,” I said. “Or our encounter will end badly for you.” Then I caught the gaze of each of the others. “I don’t want to hurt you. I came down here to be of assistance, but I’ll leave.”

Kade shifted behind me, and I flinched. He’d told me not to come down here. He’d been right.

“We’ll leave,” I amended.

The man who looked like a Dark Moth pulled something that reminded me of an old cell phone from his front pocket and pressed a red button.

Immediately, there was a crackle from above.

The sound of thunder filled the air as several jolts of electricity lit up across the sky.

“You won’t be going anywhere,” he said, studying me intently.

“Damn,” I heard Kade whisper.

I had to agree.

“I feel like I know you,” the man said, coming closer. “You said your name is Alice." His eyes roamed my body, landing on my hands and the now golden marks that told what I was. With a snap, they returned to my eyes. "You're a Dark Moth," he said. Then he glanced at my wings. "How is this possible?" His sword dipped momentarily.

That was my chance. I needed to get the button from him and release the forcefield. He noticed what I looked at and smiled.

"I never would've believed it, but my brother was right. You are half demon and half angel, a true abomination." His features were alight with wonder. "Not to mention those wings," he added.

What about my wings? I spoke into my mind thinking of Kade, but he didn't respond.

"Isn't that what the prophecy—" the woman began, but Scott backhanded her, sending her to the ground.

"She's meant to help us," another of the men said.

"Shut up," Scott said and glared the man into silence. "Now," he said and turned over his hand, so I could see he had the mark of the Dark Moth. "You see? I was like you with angelic blood as well as demon. Perhaps you met my brother, Seth?"

And that's when I knew how I knew him. "I did meet him," I said, swallowing. Was that why he was able to get in and out of Demonland? The angelic part of him. I knew it was like that for Kade.

"And you didn't die?" Scott smiled. "Not sure whether I should be impressed with you or disappointed with my twin."

I had at least a dozen questions but now wasn't the time. "Obviously," I said, feeling even more relaxed than I had a moment before. The angel and demon powers within swirled, so I felt perfectly balanced.

"If we give you the Final Death, the higher-ups will have to listen to us." Scott glanced back at his group. A few looked like they wanted to argue, but finally, they all agreed. "I am sorry, Alice, but the seven virtues are of no use today. Not in Demonland, not in the human realm, and certainly not here in the angel realm. I'm afraid your kindness will be your demise."

Was the man, right? The answer was a blatant no. My blade was still in my boot, but I didn't need it. In fact, I would take the longsword from Scott and use it against him.

The eight of them surrounded Kade and me.

"Lose the wings," Kade whispered. "They'll try to hurt you by hurting them." His vanished from his back.

I sent mine away with a thought. Somehow that made my angelic power seem more vivid. Scott came at me, his sword swinging like he intended to chop my head clean off in one motion. Quicker than I believed I could move, I lay back like I was going to do a backbend, but kept my body parallel to the ground. The sword sailed by. When Scott's hand was at eye level, I lifted one hand and struck his wrist, knocking the sword free as my power flung from my other hand and into Scott, sending him hurling back, taking two others with him.

While the sword was in the middle of falling, I grabbed the hilt out of the air and righted myself, swinging the blade around and lunging as a woman came at me.

I had the upper hand, and I could've killed her, but something held me back. Literally.

It felt like the sword. Then I heard it whisper into my mind. Killing them is not the answer.

I tried to drop the blade like it burned me, but the blasted thing wouldn't let go, clinging to me like it possessed its own set of hands.

No, Alice, I am meant to be your weapon.

What the hell? I responded.

And I heard giggling that sort of sounded like a bell tinkling. Kind of similar to the way Daya sounded when she laughed. No need to curse, Alice. I am part of the prophecy the same as you. Now that we are together, it will come to pass. She exhaled as though she were finally happy after thousands of years of waiting.

While I was still trying to figure out what was happening between me and the sword, an arrow sank into my shoulder, and I cried out.

One of the women knocked me to the ground.

Another kicked me in the side while a man yanked the arrow from my shoulder so he could stab me again. I glanced over and saw Kade was on the ground a little ways off. There was a jagged cut on one cheek, and blood oozed from the wound. His eyes were closed.

Please don't be dead, I pled as all seven of the deadly sins, and the virtues came together inside me. I felt like I was going to explode and closed my eyes. There was a snap, followed by a pop and then silence. I opened my eyes and watched as the eight of them were struck by my power and knocked out, possibly mortally wounded, but I wasn't sure.

Sounds returned, and I was breathing heavily. The smell of dust and blood and fire stung my nose.

Ripping the sword from my hand, I ran over to Kade, flinging myself to the ground beside him. "Hey," I said, slapping his cheek lightly, my face directly above his. "You're not allowed to be dead. Don't make me kiss you this time," I said, trying to make light of the situation, but inside I was frightened. If Kade were dead, I would never forgive myself.

His eyes blinked open. Glorious emerald green. "I'm alive," he whispered, then turned his head to the side and coughed. Blood tinged his bottom lip.

A sob escaped my throat. "Thank goodness." I kissed him on the forehead. "Can you stand?"

"Probably," he said, sitting up, but clutching at his ribs.

"Hang on. I'll get us out of here." I ran over to Scott and stuck my hand into his pocket, searching for the thing that would turn off the forcefield. My fingers clamped hold of it, and I pulled it out, ripping his pocket in the process.

Scott moaned, and his eyes flickered open. He grabbed hold of my arm. "It was the Dark Moths who murdered me while in the human realm. They thought me too powerful to live. After that first death, I was allowed to come here, but this place isn't the same." He rubbed his lips together. "I think Farrah is right. You are who the prophecy spoke about, and you are meant to unite all of the angels. No more division, but all of us equal." His gray eyes found mine. "Don't let them use you…" he began, and then he was gone.

Was that his Final Death? I had no idea and didn't have the time to find out. Kade was wounded, and I needed to help him. I pressed the button, and the electric currents zipped across the sky once before they vanished. Shoving the thing in my pocket, I made my way over to Kade.

"Can you fly?"

"I think so," he said, trying again to sit.

It was then I noticed the sword was next to me on the ground. Like it had crawled over. Freaking thing. I helped Kade stand. His wings popped out, and he took to the air.

I released mine as well and was about to fly when I heard crying.

Please don't leave me, Alice. I was made for you. Please.

Fine. I plucked the strange sword off the ground and then jumped into the air, using my wings to fly faster so I could catch up with Kade.

When he noticed what I was carrying, he lifted his brows. "A souvenir?"

I debated whether to tell him the truth but just shrugged. "I like it is all."

I like you too, Alice.

OceanofPDF.com

I WENT with Kade to the Healing Center, but he suggested I didn't go inside. After saying goodbye, I went back to the Seraph Academy, landing just outside the doors to the girls' dormitory.

"I saw you with him."

I flinched that she snuck up on me so easily. The sword still hanging at my side as I turned. It was Catherine, the angel who'd helped me find my way around yesterday. Now, though, her face was twisted with rage. "Saw me with who?" I asked calmly.

"Kade. When they find out what the two of you were doing, they will strip Kade of his powers and make him live in the Fallen sector." She gave me a slippery smile. "That'll serve him right after what he did to my dad." She narrowed her eyes. "Just thought you should know."

I'll take care of her, the sword said, her little voice vicious.

No.

"Catherine, whatever you think you saw, it wasn't…" I didn't know how to lie. Kade and I had been making out. There was no misreading that. "Please don't say anything," I tried, hoping I sounded contrite enough.

She crossed her arms, and some of the anger left her eyes. "I'll keep it to myself for now, but you owe me." She glanced down at the sword. "And you already have a weapon. You are definitely the Devil's daughter."

I didn't like that everyone knew more about me than I knew about them. "Who's your father?" I asked.

Instead of answering, she opened her brown wings with the blood-red ends and took to the sky.

"Well, crap!" I hurried to my room to hide the sword under my bed. Carrying it to the cafeteria seemed like a bad idea. When the sword realized I was about to leave her, she began to cry. “I can’t take you with me. People will think I’m looking for a fight,” I said, feeling weird talking to the sword out loud. What do you want me to do?

She began to shimmer and lifted into the air. Before my eyes, she transformed from a giant longsword into twin golden bracelets before wrapping herself around my wrists in the shape of my Dark Moth marks. There, she said. Now everyone will think you’re wearing bracelets and nothing more.

Alright. I started for the door, but before I opened it, I stopped. Do you have a name?

No angel has ever asked me such a question. She began to cry.

I forced myself not to grumble. She was a very emotional weapon. Well, do you? I asked, trying to keep the irritation from showing in my voice.

I am called Faithkeeper, she said, sniffling.

Nice. I’ll call you Faith.

A nickname already. Thank you, Alice. Her voice had a dreamy quality to it, and I smiled.

You’re welcome. I made my way down the hall and to over to the main building. The cafeteria was mostly empty, and I was grateful. After collecting my food, in the same way, I got it in Demonland, I tried to decide where to sit. Leia, Veronica, Thomas, and Jax were seated together at a table nearby.

Should I sit with them?

Ugh, I hated school!

Jax turned and looked at me. “Did you learn how to fly?” he asked, sounding conversational.

I waved my wings slightly and leaped into the air, hovering for a moment in answer.

Their eyes grew wide.

“Impressive,” Veronica said. Then waved me over.

“Since the five of us are going to be a team for the next several weeks, we’d better learn to work together,” Leia said.

“I’d like that,” I admitted, setting my tray on the table in the space between Leia and Jax.

The male angel winked before taking a bite of his green beans. “Your bracelets are cool. Are those the demon marks?” He pointed at the back of my hand.

I was about to correct him. They weren’t my demon marks but the mark of the Dark Moth.

“They are wicked,” Thomas added.

I decided not to lose my cool. I’d already done that once today. “Yes,” I said, and picked up my sandwich, biting into it. “Thanks,” I added after I swallowed a bite and took a drink. The water was so refreshing.

For the next twenty minutes, I listened to them talk about the assignment Kade gave them and who won. I wanted to ask what the winners received, but a message sounded over the loudspeaker.

“To all angels throughout the realm,” a female voice intoned. “I am pleased to announce that our beloved teacher, Kade Everett, will be the next headmaster of the Seraph Academy. When you see him, please offer your congratulations on receiving this great honor.”

Relief washed through me. Catherine hadn’t told anyone about Kade and me. At least not yet.

There was a crackling noise, and then the room went silent.

“Wow, that was fast,” Thomas said, picking at his fries.

“But Kade is a good teacher?” I asked and picked up my glass, pausing before I took another long drink.

“He’s the best.” Veronica cracked a smile. “And completely hot too. If only he wasn’t engaged.” She batted her lashes. “Don’t you think?” she asked.

My pulse started to race. Did Catherine tell them about Kade and me? I decided to play it smart. “He is very handsome, yes,” I admitted.

“So true. If I didn’t have a serious boyfriend, I might try and make the moves on him,” Leia said, pushing away her tray.

“But he’s off-limits even more so now. Before, it was fun to flirt even though he was engaged. Now though?” Veronica rolled her eyes. “There’s no hope for any of us.”

Thomas and Jax studied their food like it held the secrets to the universe. The discussion was awkward for them.

“But those lips?” Leia went on. “Can you imagine how they would feel—”

Thomas cleared his throat, and the conversation shifted away from Kade and on to other things.

I ate my sandwich as I debated why they were suddenly so friendly. Whether it was because I now had wings or something else, but couldn’t decide how to bring it up. Every once in a while, I would catch them studying my wings and realized they had theirs put away. I thought about putting mine away too because maybe it was a faux pas, kind of like not wearing a hat inside or something. Finally, I couldn’t take it anymore. “Is there something wrong with my wings?” The words came out more annoyed than I meant.

Thomas physically jumped.

“Should I put them away? It’s because we’re inside, right?” I hated that I sounded so overeager to please these angels I didn’t even know.

“It isn’t that…” Veronica started, giving Leia a sideways glance.

“It is considered polite to put away our wings inside,” she said and glanced down at her napkin. She was folding and unfolding the corner with one hand.

“Sorry about that.” I sent them away.

Leia shook her head. “That isn’t why we’re staring,” she went on and looked a little self-conscious. “It’s their color.” One side of her mouth lifted and twitched.

“They’re gold,” Veronica said, surprised.

“Is that bad?” It would be just my luck if they were.

“Not at all. It’s only that no other angels in this realm, or that I’ve ever met have gold in their wings. Yellow? Sure. Bronze? Definitely. But gold in unheard of these days.” Veronica forked a piece of fruit and put it in her mouth.

A quick perusal of the table verified what she was saying as fact.

Finally, Tomas spoke up. “Only angels above archangels have gold in their wings.”

“He’s right,” Leia added.

I turned to Jax. He winked, which settled my nerves a little. Maybe it wasn’t so bad?

“They’re awesome is what they are.” Jax reached out like he wanted to pat my arm, but hesitated.

“Really?” My heart fluttered nervously. Again, I was different than the other angels. Kade should’ve told me, so I was prepared. We had been slightly distracted by the making out and then the fight, but still. “Who are these higher-ups?” Kade had mentioned them before too. Or, I guess he’d said his bosses. Had he meant Raphael?

The group glanced at each other, but no one spoke.

Finally, Jax answered. “They don’t dwell in the angel realm, per se, but still know all that is happening here.” He leaned in close. “They are higher than the archangels,” he said in a whisper.

“They live in another realm?” I was confused because weren’t archangels as high as angels could go?

“Basically,” he said.

I wanted to know more but didn’t know which questions to ask to get the answers I was seeking.

Veronica and Leia got up. “We’ll see you tomorrow, Alice.” They waved goodbye and left the table.

Thomas left soon after.

When it was just Jax and me, he rotated in his seat and faced me.

I searched his eyes, admiring that they were different colors as I waited for him to say what was on his mind.

“What’s it like in Demonland?” he asked, a wispy smile on his lips.

That was the last question I expected him to ask. “Pretty similar to here,” I admitted, still surprised by the similarities of the realms.

“Really?” He was disappointed.

“It’s underground and isn’t nearly as beautiful as this realm, but… the politics are very similar.” I shrugged. “At least there I understood things.” I picked at the bread on my sandwich and waited. There was something more substantial he wanted to talk about. I could feel it.

“That makes sense.” He clasped his hands together and rested them in his lap.

“Were you born here?” I asked, hoping to put him at ease.

“Yes,” he admitted and turned back to his plate. “My father is the archangel Gabriel, and my mother was the angel of death,” he said, sneaking a peek at me.

Surely he wasn’t suggesting that my mom was his mom. I mean, there had to be a new angel of death since my mom no longer had wings. “What’s her name?” I asked, working to keep calm.

“Joanna d’Arc. The human who led the French army against the English in the human realm. The same woman who because a revenant and was tricked into becoming a vampire.” His eyes held mine as he spoke. “Then she became the angel of death—”

“You’re telling me your mother is my mother.” I eked out, the words getting caught in my throat.

That’s amazing, Faith said into my mind.

I’d forgotten she was there. Is it?

“We’re half-siblings.” He bit into what appeared to be asparagus and chewed.

“How? Wha—” Where did I begin? I had a brother. His name was Jax. “Do you hate me?” I don’t know why I asked the question. It was dumb.

“No way. Why would I?” Jax asked, laughing.

“I don’t know. Maybe because your mom is in the human realm, and she’s a vampire again, and that might be my fault?” I didn’t think it was, but what did I know. I picked up my fork tapped it nervously on the table.

Jax rested a hand over mine, stopping the noise. “I don’t blame you for her choices. From what I’ve read, you didn’t even know your mom was alive until a year ago.” He leaned back, a soft smile on his face. “She told me about you, and I hoped someday to meet you.” He ate another asparagus spear. “I think it’s cool.”

I couldn’t help the laughter that bubbled out of me. “I have a brother. That is cool.”

“Right? And I have a sister.”

“Do the others know we’re related?” I was no longer hungry.

“If they do, no one has said anything. I casually asked Leia what she knew about you. She knows what we all do. That you’re the Devil’s daughter as well as the daughter of an archangel. As for me…” He smiled. “She knows even less, which is exactly how I like it.” He wiped his hands on his napkin before tossing it on the tray with his unfinished food.

“Is that good?” I stabbed one of the vegetables in my salad but didn’t eat it.

“I’ve found the less the angels know about me, the better.” He licked his lips. “That thinking comes from the way I was raised. But honestly, if anyone tries hard enough, they can find what they’re looking for.”

“Reveal as necessary,” I said, understanding as I set down my fork.

“That’s my motto.” He stood, picking up his tray. “I’m meeting Thomas for a game of hockey tomorrow after dinner, want to come?”

“Hockey? As in ice hockey?” One of my favorite books had a main character who played the sport, but I’d never seen it in real life. Hell, I’d never even seen ice before.

“Yep, the Academy has a frozen pond behind this building so we can ice skate or play hockey whenever we want.” He smiled. “It’s a lot more fun with wings and no padding added into the mix.”

I laughed. “Thanks,” I said and scooted out my chair. I was done too.

“Sure.” He glanced at my uniform. “It can get a little chilly, so make sure you wear a coat.” He started to walk away. “Hey, Alice?” He glanced back.

I tucked in my chair and lifted my tray. “Yeah?”

“I’m glad you’re here and that we get to spend time together.” He flashed his gorgeous smile.

“So am I,” I said, following him over to where we put the trays.

Finished, we walked together out of the building. He went left, with a promise that he would see me tomorrow, and I went right, following the golden path. Inside the dorms, I walked the halls until I reached my room. Then entered the code and went in.

Catherine was sitting on my bed, reading my Angels 101 book.

When the door closed, she shut the book and threw it on my bed.

I should’ve known she would get in here. She knew the code. That meant I needed to figure out how to change it. Pronto! “What are you doing in my room?” My newly combined powers churned to life.

Let me at her, Faith hissed, slithering along my hand like liquid gold.

“I haven’t told anyone what I saw, and now you need to do something for me,” she said, standing.

That was fast. “What?” I leaned against the wall just past the bathroom, trying to act calm, but that wasn't how I was feeling.

"There's a weapon I want you to retrieve for me," she began, walking around my room, touching everything.

"Okay," I prodded.

"It's known by many names, but it looks a lot like the sword you held earlier. Last I heard it was in the hands of the leader of the Fallen. But it seems he suffered his Final Death. Any idea of how that happened?"

If she'd seen Kade and I kissing, it stood to reason she'd seen us fight those in the Fallen sector, including Scott. But I decided to play coy.

Faith writhed against my skin, and I tucked my hands behind my back.

"What do you want with the sword?" I asked, instead of answering her question.

"That's none of your business. But tell me, where is the sword you carried earlier today?"

I tried to act nonchalant. "Need to know." I ground my teeth together.

"I think that sword is the one I'm looking for. Give it to me now, and I won't tell anyone about you and the headmaster." She came forward, trying to look intimidating, but it wasn't working.

You can't give her to me. You can't, Faith moaned.

Hush. I had no intention of cowing to Catherine. "I'm sure it wasn't the sword you were looking for," I said. "But tell me about the one you want, and perhaps I can locate it for you." I held my breath, pretending I wasn't bothered by her request.

She crossed her arms, glancing at me from under her long black lashes.

My pulse quickened. Did she already know I had the sword? "What do you want with this sword?" I asked, pushing off the wall and coming toward her.

You cannot give me to her, Alice. Please. She will use me for evil. Of that, I am certain.

"That is none of your business, but let's just say I will use it as intended."

Talk about vague. "Okay, then what's so special about it? Why can't you just use any sword?"

You must know that a talking sword is special, Faith harrumphed.

"So many questions." She picked up the Angels 101 book and flipped through the pages until she found the one she was looking for. Then she handed it to me. "Here is the description of the sword, what it does, and why it is special. There is also a picture." She eyed me.

When I took the book from her, Catherine pointed to the sword. It didn't look anything like the one Scott tried to kill me with, but since Faith could shift into bracelets, I was pretty sure she could shift into a lot of different things, which was probably why Catherine wanted it. "I'll see what I can do."

She tilted her head to one side. "Fine." She snapped the book shut and handed it to me. "You have one week to give me what I want." She pushed passed me and went to the door. "And Alice, if you tell anyone or try in any way to get out of this, your secret will be revealed."

It was just her word against mine. Plus, I seriously doubted Kade would back her story up. "Catherine," I began, but she held up a hand.

"Also, I know how you demons work, and you probably think that you'll screw me over since it's my word against yours and Kade's, but I have the pictures to prove it." From her pocket, she removed a device that looked sort of like a watch. She pressed a button and a holographic image of Kade, and I kissing appeared in the space between Catherine and me.

Heat rushed to my face as I watched myself in Kade's arms. If Wrythe ever saw that? I clenched my hands into fists.

"The two of you?" She peeled her gaze from the image. "Damn hot." She clicked the button, and blessedly, the vision vanished. Then she opened the door. "One week."

Once she was gone, I studied the lock and found a way to change the code. I did that immediately and then took a shower. As the water ran, I leaned against the wall and cried. I missed Daya and Styx, and most of all, I missed Wrythe. Would he understand about Kade and me? The two of us were over, but that hologram? It was horrible. Still, without kissing Kade, there wouldn't be closure. He chose someone else, and so did I. Wrythe. And I loved him.

After the shower, I climbed into bed, exhausted. It'd been a long day.

What are you going to do about Catherine? Faith asked. She sounded tired too. Could swords get tired? She no longer looked like a sword or bracelets but sat on my dresser in the shape of an ordinary, smooth rock.

I don't know. What I want to know is why she wants you? I put my hands behind my head and closed my eyes.

As you've already guessed, I am not your average sword.

"Is that so?" I whispered, trying not to smile.

She hissed. Yes. I was created when the first angel stepped through into Earth from the eighth world. He was named War. His mate was Peace. Then came the female Pestilence and the male, Health. Followed by Famine and Plenty. Lastly came Death and Life. The first eight. Balance. The Heavenly Harbingers. And I was the original sword. Faith paused, and I guessed she did it for effect. It worked.

You really are unique, I said.

That I am, she responded before continuing. In the millennia since the Harbingers arrived, their stories have changed from truth to fiction. That's probably for the best because they are terrifying, though not as much as their creators.

You've seen their creators? That surprised me.

Oh yes. They created me and gifted me to War. They are like nothing and everything, the beginning, and the end. They can be mist and corporeal. They can be whatever they want. And… She paused.

I waited, but she didn't continue. What is it, Faith?

A portion of the creators dwells within me, she finally admitted.

Alright, so you're beyond exceptional, I said, unable to hold in my smile this time.

You know it, she snapped. For a good millennia, War kept me with him. I was there when he and the others created this realm. After another millennium, he and the others saw what was happening—that though their offspring came from the seven virtues, they also possessed many of the deadly sins. The angels fought among themselves, and war became almost second nature among them. The Seraph Academy was built to cultivate and teach the new angels, making them nearly as human as those in the human realm. The only difference was their angelic powers.

Are the demons connected to the angels? If the Heavenly Harbingers were opposites, I wondered how they fit in with the demons and the Devil.

The original archangel was the Devil, though he was known as Deckland. War, thinking to give his first creation a symbol of unity, presented Deckland with me.

She sounded sad.

Deckland didn't use me as a symbol of unity but as a harbinger of death, and all he wanted was to escape from this realm. Your father created the first Welcome Station though that wasn't what it was called at the time. When he stepped through the portal, he Fell. Even though he hoped to take me with him, I refused to leave the angel realm, and he had no choice but to leave me.

Holy hell, I said as things suddenly slid into place. My father hadn't sent me here so I could learn about my angel half. Without question, my father sent me here for Faith. He wanted her. Did Faith know that? Faith, I began, but paused, unsure of how to frame my question.

I sense you know the truth. Deckland wants me back, she said, her voice trembling. Since our connection, I've been pondering the coincidence of it all. Why would the Devil's daughter be half-angel and be the one to find and wield me hours after she arrives? Not only that, but you are the one the prophecy speaks of—

You believe in the prophecy too? I was so over it. Surely nothing and no one could predict or forecast the future.

Of course, Alice.

What does the prophecy say?

She will rise as with the Harbingers. Child of light and dark. With her, she will bring unity. But fair warning. Unlike the Heavenly Harbingers, she possesses virtues and vice within her soul. If she chooses vice, all will be lost.

Apprehension coursed along my skin like lightning. Hearing Faith say the words was a reminder to my heart. I already knew them but had forgotten.

Alice? Are you okay?

I'm fine, I lied.

Good. Because what I was going to say is this. I don't think your father wants me back so much as he wants you to give me to him. Doing so would pass on the mantle of power, and he would once again rule the angel realm and the realm of demons. Can you imagine? I don't know that anyone could stand against him… except possibly the Creators, and from all I've seen, they don't interfere too often.

I would never give Faith to my father. I will protect you at all costs.

Thank you, Alice.

I needed to talk about something else to get my mind off what she'd said. Did you speak to any of the other angels?

No! Nor have I shown anyone just how versatile I can be. You are the first since War that I've spoken to.

I wasn't sure whether to feel gratitude or worry that she waited for so long. Not even Scott?

Definitely not that awful Fallen leader.

How did you change hands after my father?

The archangel Uriel found me and proceeded to reign. At first benignly, but over time… I'll tell you the most significant thing I've learned.

What's that?

If you allow the need for power to fester, one thing is certain. There will always be blood. She sniffled. The things I have been made to do. I just can't even tell you.

I'm sorry, Faith.

Uriel received his Final Death and is no more. Since then, I was passed around and used until I could no longer take it and shut myself off. It wasn't until your hand landed on my hilt that I awakened back to myself.

What a horrible existence. I would take good care of her and treat her well. I'll do my best to honor you.

And that is why we are speaking, and I can show you all that I am and can do. She shivered. You are different even than War. Not even he knew all I am capable of. She hiccupped and sniffled.

How was that possible? She didn't have a nose? I shook my head. As though you and I are one, I said.

I have a secret, she went on.

What is it? I asked, thinking I might already know. There was a similarity between her and me, and Kade and I. Earlier Kade and I talked about soulmates. Before this moment, I believed the word coincided with romance, but now I knew that wasn't true.

You and I are—

"Soulmates," I said, finishing her sentence and rolling onto my side, allowing her sudden joy at my use of the word to run through me. I had a brother and a friend, even if she was just a weapon. And that led me back to Catherine. If you won't do your thing for just anyone, why does Catherine want you so badly?

For the same reason, your father does. Whoever possesses me is given greater authority over others. Without sharing any of my more significant gifts and talents, I naturally enhance the angelic power of the one who wields me. Over the years, I've been called by many names, including Sword of War, Sword of Uriel, Flaming Sword, Burning Stick—not my favorite—Finger of God and more. Only you know my real name.

I'm honored, Faith. Thank you. I yawned, tugging the covers up over my shoulder.

It's as it should be. I'm not sure whether War knows this truth or not, but I was created for you. Goodnight, Alice.

Goodnight.

I thought about all Faith said, until I fell asleep. During the night, I dreamed that angels were operating on my brain. My scalp was peeled back, revealing the blood and sinew under my hair and skin. As I watched them work, I tried to understand what they were saying, but their words didn't compute except one. Baby. When I woke in the morning, the dream and that word sat heavy in my heart and made my stomach sick. What did it mean? It had to be my subconscious' way of getting rid of all I'd been through recently. That was it, right?

Shaking the dream away, I dressed, adding the demon orb and my knife to my right white boot. Faith changed into my bracelets while I got dressed. I slipped them on before going to the mirror, where I brushed my hair. At seeing my reflection, I thought of Wrythe.

"I love you, my king. We'll be together again soon," I whispered, wiping at a wayward tear as I went to the door.

I'm sure he loves you too, Faith said.

If I could've hugged her, I would have. She said exactly what I needed to hear. After locking up, I headed to the cafeteria. It was crowded, but I scooted past the other angels like a phantom. No one spoke to me though several glanced over. Trying not to focus on them and what they might be thinking, I grabbed a breakfast sandwich and left the cafeteria, heading out of the cafeteria. From there, I walked through the grand entryway and went to the back of the building. Outside, I searched for the frozen pond. To my right and behind the cafeteria was a strange structure, but I didn't give it my attention. Instead, I found the frozen pond straight again. Angels would fly and skate, using their wings in such a lovely way, it was like watching a dream. On girl tucked in her pale blue wings as she leaped into the air. Then extended her wings and twirled before landing.

I clapped, and she glanced over, smiling before returning her focus to what she was doing. I went to a bench to sit and eat. Jax was right, though. It was chilly over here, but I liked it.

OceanofPDF.com

INSTEAD OF TAKING the elevator or the stairs to my class on the roof, I flew. I wasn't the first one there. In fact, everyone else was already there and talking to a new angel. She had bubblegum pink hair with matching wings, except the edges which were black.

Jax saw me and waved.

I returned it, glad he really wanted us to get to know one another.

The woman noticed and straightened, coming toward me. "You must be Alice," she said. "I'm Aaryn Grinson, your new teacher."

"It's nice to meet you," I said, trying to ignore how she gawked at my wings.

"I heard about them but had to see for myself," she said, her voice wispy. "They are lovely," she added, licking her pink lips.

"Thank you." I tucked my hands into my pockets, feeling self-conscious. In one swift motion, I noticed the rest of the class was staring at me too.

Take a picture, it lasts longer, I thought.

Faith snickered.

"This morning, I will be testing you for speed and agility," Aaryn began, speaking to the group as she walked over to a silver line pulsing near the opposite edge of the building. "You will start here and fly, following the holographic barrier between the Protestas land and the archangel land until you reach Grace Mountain. There, you will pick up a flag and then return to this point. The first one back will be the team leader for the mission will be going on this afternoon." Her light pink eyes met each of ours. "Are there any questions?"

No one said anything.

"Great. Everyone line up."

Veronica, Leia, Thomas, and Jax went over and took their places behind the line. I followed but wondered if we were ever going to do any book work. I really wanted to know why I had golden wings and what precisely that meant.

"Get set," Aaryn barked.

I glanced back at my new teacher. She gave me a quick wink. "Go!"

Jax and Veronica were the first in the air, followed by Leia and Thomas.

Flap those golden wings, Faith hollered into my mind. Hurry! Losing sucks.

I'm going. I stepped forward, stumbling slightly. For some reason, I was nervous. Thankfully, after yesterday's practice, my wings knew what to do and lifted me into the air.

The direction Kade flew me yesterday was opposite to the way we were going today. For that reason, I was hesitant though the holographic trees were like the other barrier. The land around us was different. The archangel building on the left had a bright silver hue to them while the buildings on the protestas side were strictly white. I'd seen some of that region yesterday as well. The archangel district was so different. Opulent was the word that came to mind, and lush was another. Exquisite flowing gardens surrounded each building with angelic water features. Each building had its own park. There was a central location with silver streets and shining dining establishments without a roof so that a customer could fly in or out. Beyond the center street were more buildings followed by forest, and then what I guessed were the Lava Falls. The molten magma rolled slowly down the side of an enormous volcano. Every once in a while, the interior would sputter and send sprays of boiling hot liquid into the air. At first, I was shocked that the archangels chose such a location. If they were the upper class of the angels, one would think such a danger would've been delegated to the Fallen.

But as I watched another spray of the liquid shoot into the air, one large cluster sailed higher than the others. When it arced its way down, I thought it might hit a building, but it struck an invisible barrier. From there, it fizzled and changed to gold. That was when I noticed a group of angels surrounding the volcano. When the gold reached the group, the angels picked them up and put them in a basket.

Alice, stop sightseeing. You have a race to win. Don't embarrass me. Faith's voice startled me, and I glanced down and saw I'd veered away from the barrier and into the archangel district. Quickly righting myself, I kicked it into high gear. Jax was the furthest away followed closely by Veronica, Thomas, and then Leia. It almost looked like she wasn't trying.

I zipped past her, causing her silver hair to blow everywhere.

"Hey," she said.

I wanted to keep going but had a thought and looked back. "Leia, are you okay?"

She let out a sob. "Not really, but it's fine. Don't worry about me."

You heard her, Faith said. Faster!

Releasing a deep breath, I turned around. "Are you hurt?" I asked when I fell in beside Leia.

"Physically, no, but…" Her bottom lip trembled. "I broke up with my boyfriend last night." Tears filled her eyes.

Relief washed over my soul. That was bad, but at least it wasn't life or death. Or I hoped not. "I'm so sorry, Leia. Is there anything I can do?"

She glanced over and gave me a watery smile. "No, I'm fine. Really. Hurry up. Don't let the rest of them beat you." She flicked her chin, indicating I should keep going.

"Alright." I returned her smile and took off.

Maybe things were going to be different here between me and the others. I hoped so.

Go! Go! Go! Faith chanted.

I banked right and beat my wings hard, raising myself high into the air, going on a gut feeling. I had no idea whether it would work or not, but I decided it wouldn't hurt to try. When I was well above the others, I relaxed a moment, squinting in search of the flags we were supposed to retrieve. They were there, each a different color. Silver for Leia. Lavender for Veronica. Cream for Jax. Brown for Thomas. And gold for me. Against the stark white snow, they stood out. I continued to fly in that direction until I was ready, then angled my body down and closed my wings.

What are you doing? Faith asked, fear in her voice.

I have no idea, I admitted. With my hands at my sides, I felt like a bullet shooting my way toward the flags. The wind rushed against my cheeks, making it hard to see I was going so fast. I pursed my lips together and hoped I wasn't going to regret this.

And I was gaining on the others. In no time, I passed Thomas. In another few seconds, I sailed by Veronica. Jax was nearly at the flags, and I angled my body slightly to pass him. When I went by, I shouted. "Hey, bro," and smiled.

Jax glanced up, surprised, and then a look of horror filled his face.

I didn't understand at first. And when I finally did, it was too late.

This isn't going to end well, Faith said mournfully.

She was right. I opened my wings, jerking myself back, but it still didn't slow me enough, and I sailed past the flags and kept going until I went into the mist and crashed into a snowdrift. It hurt, but not as bad as I expected. What was worse? I was face first in the stuff, my arms and legs buried in snow. Foulest of all? I couldn't move my body. Thankfully my wings were free enough, and I beat them back, trying to pull myself out. The snow was too heavy, and I was getting colder by the second. This was a bad idea, I said into my mind.

You think? Faith was upset and pouting.

I thought I would like snow, but my first experience has changed my mind.

Faith didn't respond.

In the distance, I heard Jax and Veronica calling for me.

I wanted to shout that I was here. Or help me. Or anything.

Fear crept along my spine. What if no one found me?

I was cold. So cold. And I couldn't think straight.

Have you so quickly forgotten who you are? Faith asked in a huff. When I didn't respond, she continued, You're the freaking Devil's daughter, not to mention the daughter of the Angel of Death. You are a bad a. Now use some of your power and get us out of here!

Okay. At her words, my power—that was no longer demonic or angelic but a combination of both—erupted inside me. It was liquid gold and sunshine. It grew in my chest and raced along my spine. There was an unfamiliar sound around me until I realized it was the snow melting.

Once again, I beat my wings, using all of my might to pull me from the snow. It worked better than I expected, and I was flung backward and landed on something.

"Oof. Alice," Jax said.

"Sorry." I worked to stand, flapping my wings to get myself off him. When I was on my feet, I turned. Jax was still on his back, his wings out behind him. Veronica was beside him, rubbing her head. Apparently, I knocked them both over.

There was another moan. Thomas was on the other side of Jax.

Had I knocked him over too.

Leia arrived then, a look of confusion on her face. "What happened here?" She put her hands on her hips.

"I— it was an accident," I said, holding one hand out for Jax and the other for Veronica. They took them and stood. Then I went over and helped Thomas up.

"Alice thought she would win by flying like a missile," Jax said, chuckling, a look of admiration on his face.

“I’m so sorry,” I said again, hoping he and the others could forgive me.

“It was pretty awesome,” Thomas said, running a hand through his whacked-out hair.

“Yeah, up until you crashed, it was pretty great,” Veronica added. Her hair was in a tangle, and I helped her fix it.

“Thanks,” I said, grateful they weren’t yelling or hating on me. Maybe their virtuous traits were more robust than I first believed. That was good.

“What happened in the mist?” Jax asked, glancing over my shoulder warily. “Did you see anything? None of us has ever been inside. It isn’t permitted.”

I shrugged, unsure what to say. I didn’t see anything. “I landed in the snow and couldn’t move for a while. I heard you and Veronica calling me, but I couldn’t get out.” I paused, wondering if I should tell them about my angel power. Surely they had some just as the demons did even though I hadn’t seen them use it yet. “I kept flapping my wings like an angry chicken until I finally broke free.”

“An angry chicken?” Thomas tilted his head to one side as if he were trying to see my words in his mind. Then he stuck his hands under his armpits and began flapping his arms and his wings at the same time while squawking like a chicken.

At first, I was shocked. Goofing off wasn’t something that was done in Demonland.

Leia started laughing, followed by Jax and Veronica.

I guess here it was fine. A gurgle of happiness erupted from my throat, and I covered my mouth. Was this okay? As far as I could tell.

Jax joined in, flapping his wings and crowing like a rooster.

I couldn’t help myself and double over in laughter. It was a rarity, especially since I was laughing so hard I was crying. It felt good. Being with these four, I felt comfortable and let myself go.

The guys kept at it and started scratching at the snow with their feet. Even Faith was laughing like she swallowed a helium tank.

Veronica was on the ground, sitting with her wings extended and her legs flat out in front of her. She wiped her eyes.

Leia had collapsed to her knees but was now hovering a few feet of the ground, and her cheeks were rosy red. “You guys are nuts.” She touched her cheeks with the backs of her hands.

Thomas and Jax stopped at the same time.

I straightened.

“How about we fly back at normal fast speeds and not rocket speeds?” Jax patted me on the shoulder, light, and mirth still evident on his face.

“Deal,” I said, and feeling a jolt of exhilaration, reached out and hugged him.

He hugged me back. “Let’s try this again,” he said, going over to the edge of the cliff.

We lined up in the snow, each of us probably fifteen feet apart and holding our flags.

“Go.” Jax leaped into the air, and the rest of us followed him.

I didn’t push this time, and when we reached the Seraph Academy roof, I came in third after Jax and Veronica. Not bad, I supposed, but Faith didn’t agree.

OceanofPDF.com

JAX WAS PRONOUNCED THE WINNER, and we broke for lunch. After getting our food, Veronica led us to an atrium built of white steel that came to a point in the center of the room and high above. Clinging to the brackets was green ivy with white flowers blooming sporadically. We found a round table with enough chairs for all of us. I sat between Jax and Leia. It felt good to be outside in the sunshine. I ate and listened to the others talk and secretly wondered how I ever survived deep below the ground for so long.

Veronica shared that she was full-on Protestas while Leia and Thomas were half chayot and half protestas. I already knew about Jax, which was good because he chose not to talk about it. And they all knew my heritage. From there, they went on to discuss the reasons why they weren't taking classes with the rest of the school. Apparently, Veronica liked to fight. Thomas had a difficult time in large social situations and would refuse to talk, which irritated his teachers and other students. Leia had tried to skip school altogether and sneak into one of the Welcome Stations to go to the human realm and serve alongside her three older brothers. And Jax? He and several other angels pulled a prank on one of the teachers. Only he got caught, and he refused to rat out the others. Totally unfair, but he shrugged it off.

When we returned to the roof, Aaryn was already there and speaking with Kade. At the sight of him, my pulse skipped a few beats. Then I thought of Wrythe, and my heart raced for him.

Kade didn't stay long. When he left, he didn't even look my way. I was glad because I didn't want things to be weird between us. But I debated whether to tell Kade about Catherine and her blackmailing me. She told me not to say anything, but if Kade and I could somehow get it in front of what she intended to do, maybe it wouldn't be so bad. Not to mention, I couldn't give up Faith.

Aaryn clapped her hands as she walked over to our group. "It's good to see the five of you getting along. Life is better when you can trust those around you." She met my eyes.

I swallowed and nodded and hoped that was enough of a response.

"Now, for this afternoon's lesson, I will be evaluating each of you on how well you work together as a team and how quickly you're able to accomplish the given task." She removed a remote that looked a lot like what Catherine had used to show me she really had dirt on Kade and I and pushed a button.

A holographic image appeared. Jagged and sparkling crystals twinkled in the mild afternoon light casting prisms of rainbows into the air.

It was beautiful.

"This is Crystal Peak," Aaryn began. "Your task is to collect as many crystals as possible within three minutes. But," she said and paused.

"This place is deceiving," Jax said, nodding.

I glanced at him, thinking he would make a great leader.

Aaryn agreed. "That's right. Crystal Peak is beautiful, but it can be dangerous." Aaryn pressed the button again, and the hologram vanished. "Rule number one. You must remain flying at all times. Touching down could create dire consequences for you or the chayot land and the angels living there."

That didn't sound good, and my stomach quivered with worry.

"Second, you must return to the roof with your crystals by dark. A second later and the mission will be considered a failure." She locked eyes with me.

I swallowed but didn't say anything.

"We won't fail," Veronica said, her voice filled with determination.

I found myself agreeing as did Thomas and Jax, but Leia had her eyes on the ground. She was obviously still upset about her boyfriend dumping her. I hoped she was up for the challenge.

"May I speak with you privately?" Leia asked Aaryn.

The teacher's gaze cut into Leia. "No excuses," she snapped.

Leia looked like she wanted to cry.

Aaryn handed the remote to Jax. "You are welcome to use this, but I want it back unbroken."

"I'll keep it safe." Jax clamped it in one hand.

"We've got this," Veronica said, giving Leia a sideways glance.

Jax agreed with her as did the rest of us.

"Good. After today's assessment, classes will be different," Aaryn said, checking her watch. "We won't meet on the roof tomorrow morning, but will be meeting on Sub Floor One for weapons training." She held up her first finger to emphasize. "You'll have to take the elevators down."

Back underground, I thought, darkly.

Once I was buried for ten long years. It was horrible contending with the writhing creatures living down there.

Sorry, Faith, I said, shoving my hands into my back pockets.

Aaryn was still talking. "You have thirty minutes to come up with a plan. By minute thirty-one, you must be in the air." She shot us a smile. Extended her wings, flapping them lightly. "Time starts now," she said and lifted into the air. In the sky next to Jax appeared a holographic timer that was counting down.

"What's the plan, Jax?" I asked, feeling inadequate to help since I knew very little about the place.

IT TURNED out none of us had been to Crystal Peak. Clumped in a sporadic circle, the five of us concocted a plan. It was easy enough. The hardest part was getting there. First, because it was so far away in chayot territory at the most northeastern point of the realm and secondly because the chayot kept sentinels in the sky to guard their air space from possible attack. So, we would have to get into the chayot territory, but once there, we would have to convince the chayot we weren't there to do anything nefarious. Then we would have to get to Crystal Peak, collect as many crystals as possible, and return to the roof.

Not impossible.

We agreed to retrieve our pillowcases from our beds and meet back on the roof in fifteen minutes. Veronica, Leia, and I flew down to the girls' dorm while Jax and Thomas flew down the other side. They were in a different wing of the dormitory than me, so we parted at the entrance.

Catherine was waiting for me at my door. "You changed the lock. You're smarter than you look."

I didn't respond, but pushed past her, and went to my door. Catherine was hovering, and I refused to let her see my passcode. "What do you want?" I asked.

"Just to know if you've done anything to find what I asked you to." Her eyes scrutinized my face for a clue.

"Not yet," I admitted. "But I will."

She rolled her eyes and turned away. "Better hurry, Alice. Time's ticking." She pushed open the door and was gone.

I sighed in relief and opened my door.

That angel needs an attitude adjustment, Faith said. I can do it if you want. Just let me at her.

You're too kind, but no. Not yet. I might change my mind another day. But at the moment, I still hoped we could work things out without violence.

Faith sulked as I ripped my pillowcase off my pillow and tucked it into my back pocket before heading back over to the main building and flying up to the roof. I was the first student there. Kade was there too.

He saw me and sighed with relief. “You’re going to Crystal Peak?”

“Yes,” I said, curious about what he was doing here.

“Be careful. The crystals are benign for most angels, but for some, they can be more than just beautiful prisms. They are humanity collectors. Within each crystal are many memories or emotions or both from any being with a soul. I fear for you they might be… distracting.” He blew out a breath. “I told Aaryn my concerns, but she isn’t worried.” He ran a hand through his hair. “I hope she’s right. Still, I wanted you to be prepared.” His features softened as his eyes roamed down to my hands. “What’s this?” He lifted one hand to study my gold tattoos and the bracelets, touching it softly.

Faith vibrated. He has a nice touch.

Shush! I pulled my hand away. “Nothing,” I said aloud.

Kade’s eyes widened. “Is this?”

Veronica appeared, followed by Leia.

“Hey headmaster Everett,” Veronica said.

I knew I should step away from Kade. We were too close. But I needed to speak with him. “It’s urgent I speak with you about something,” I hissed.

I’ll meet you in your room tonight. Keep the door unlocked. He turned and said hello to the girls before lifting into the air and leaving.

You indeed are the one the prophecy spoke about, Faith said, her voice awed.

I was starting to get sick of the whole prophecy business but didn’t voice my concerns.

“What did he want?” Leia asked, eyeing me shrewdly. The girl was very intuitive.

Kade hadn’t said I wasn’t allowed to share what he told me, so I decided they should know.

“Weird,” Veronica said. When Thomas and Jax arrived, she told them what we’d learned.

“I’m so glad he shared,” Jax said. “I heard rumors like that but didn’t believe them. Until now.”

“We’ll be on our guard,” Thomas said.

“Agreed.” Jax nodded. “Everyone ready?” He lifted into the sky, his cream wings with orange ends were beautiful against the afternoon sun.

I fluttered mine and beat them against the air, lifting off the ground and followed the others.

Jax led the way briefly until Veronica came up beside him.

We’d decided not to follow the holographic barrier line since there was no point, but decided on the most direct path. Once we were outside the Seraph Academy fence, we were immediately in chayot territory where we were accosted by two sentinels.

“What is your business?” the one with gray wings asked.

Jax told them what we were doing.

After only a slight delay, they let us pass. Aaryn had told the chayot we were coming, and they agreed to let us into their space. As we went through, other chayot sentinels flew with us or stopped us to ask questions.

It was surprising to see the chayot with wings. I had believed the angels couldn’t fly or that they didn’t have wings. Apparently, that wasn’t true for all of them.

Each time we were stopped, the chayot made a point of checking out my wings. One even went so far as to touch some of my feathers. I flinched and temporarily spun out of control, causing our group a delay. Thankfully, the others were supportive and didn’t hold my lack of experience against me.

The peak stood so grandly in the distance; I could see it when we got about halfway through the territory. The crystals would catch on the sunlight and twinkle or create rainbows. It was stunning, and I could tell the chayot were proud it was in their area.

By the time we reached the peak itself, some of the excitement had worn off. I didn't know about the others, but my wings were tired, and I needed to rest. But we weren't allowed to stop flying. That was one of the rules. Another problem we saw immediately? There weren't any crystals we could carry in our pillowcases. The smallest was about my size in thickness and height.

"I'm going to fly around the peak and see if there are smaller ones on the other side. Anyone want to come?" Jax eyed me. I was about to say yes but saw that Leia was waning. "I'll stay and help Leia."

"I don't need your help," she snapped.

"You sure?" I ignored her glare because I understood why she was behaving like that. She was tired.

"I'll stay with her," Veronica said.

"I'll come too," Thomas added.

Jax was hesitant. "I don't like that we're splitting up, but we need to see if there are smaller crystals. I'm guessing there must be." He eyed Veronica and Leia. "Do not touch down. We'll hurry."

Leia gritted her teeth but gave a quick nod.

"We won't touch down," Veronica said.

I got the feeling she wasn't being honest, but what could I do?

"We'll hurry," Jax said, and took off.

Thomas followed behind him, and I trailed them both.

"Thomas, can you fly higher and see if there is something at the top?"

"On it," Thomas said and batted his wings, lifting himself higher.

"Alice, take the middle ground."

I rose so that the three of us were covering all aspects of the enormous peak. My wings were tired. I was tired, but stopping wasn't an option. So I kept going. Flying closer and closer to the crystals until

I was soaring around and between and over and under them. As I went, I would occasionally hear a voice or see a flash of something. Thanks to Kade, I wasn't frightened or surprised by the snippets, and I continued on. As I went deeper between the crystals, I found some smaller ones—almost like new leaves on a plant.

A wave of happiness rolled through me. We could do this. Plucking a small crystal out of its nook, I hurried out to tell the others. Jax was below, and Thomas was above, but they were a little further away. "Hey," I shouted to get their attention.

They both looked at me, and I held up the crystal. "Fly into the crystals," I continued. "The further in you go, the smaller the crystals."

"What?" Thomas responded and flew down to me.

Jax came over as well.

"See?" I said, holding the crystal in my palm. "There are dozens of smaller crystals like this, but you have to go deep in between the bigger ones." My eyes flashed back and forth between them.

Thomas took the crystal and studied it. "Cool." He handed it back, and I put it in my pocket. I'd use the pillowcase after I told Veronica and Leia.

Jax gave me a super watt smile. "You figured it out." He squeezed my shoulder before heading in. "We need to hurry. We're running out of time."

"I'm going to tell the others," I said and took off without waiting for a response. More hands made light work. That was a phrase Peter would quote from time to time. At the thought of him, my heart flashed with pain. But instead of sinking into the hurt, I pushed faster.

OceanofPDF.com

AS SOON AS I reached the other side, I knew there was a problem. Veronica and Leia weren't visible, and I called them.

No one answered.

I searched the sky in the direction of the Academy, thinking they might have headed back, but they were too far away if they had. Then I glanced down, wondering if they'd landed after all. They weren't there either.

I called them again. That's when I heard what sounded like singing or crying. I wasn't sure which. But it was coming from within the crystals.

Hesitant, I followed the sound. "Leia, is that you?" I asked, flying up and over several giant crystals and maneuvering through them until there was a place big enough for me to enter. She wasn't there. Neither of them was. As I finessed my way deeper, a random voice or vision would display itself. As instructed, I ignored them. They didn't concern me. Until I heard a familiar voice.

"She will be back," he growled.

Instantly, I knew it was Wrythe.

The sane part of my mind told me to disregard the voice and keep looking for my friends. But my heart ached at the sound of my fiancé, and I unconsciously flew in for a closer look.

Sure enough, it was him. "Wrythe," I whispered, touching the place on the crystal where he stood.

Faith, who'd been mostly quiet, spoke up. Ignore the visions and find Veronica and Leia. I fear they are in danger.

Of course, she was right, but I couldn't pull away. "Wrythe," I called again.

He turned as though he heard me and walked forward as though he saw me as well. My heart pounded in my chest. “Can you hear me?” I asked.

When I spoke, the crystals around me began to vibrate.

“Alice?” he asked, moving forward. I recognized Wrythe was in his office and knew he must be able to see me from inside the mirror hanging across from his desk.

Tears filled my eyes, and I sniffled. “It’s me,” I said.

The crystals vibrated harder and shook like a chandelier in an earthquake.

“How is this possible?” he asked, and pressed his palm against the glass.

“I don’t know,” I admitted, ignoring the catastrophe happening around me. All that mattered was Wrythe. My palm pressed against what I thought would be the crystal, but our hands touched. I let out a sob as the warmth from his hand sent shivers along my arm.

“You’re okay.” His fingers twined with mine, and his face twisted in agony. “And more beautiful than ever.” A tendril of a smile lit up his serious face.

I leaned forward, desperate for him in any way I could get him. He did the same, and our lips touched for the briefest moment. Then he reached through, and his hands cupped my face as his eyes roamed over me before flaring. “Are those wings?” he asked, surprised.

Alice! Alice, stop this. You’re going to send every last crystal down onto the chayot sector.

What? I glanced around, and sure enough, crystals were falling all around me like teeth coming loose from their gums.

“You aren’t safe.” Wrythe tried to pull me to him, but I resisted.

“I’ll be okay, and I’ll see you soon,” I said, breaking free. In doing so, I knocked back into a crystal, and it started to fall. “I love you,” I said and then reached out and grabbed the crystal desperate to hold it in place. But it was too heavy, and I was too small compared to its size, and it slipped from my grasp.

I darted in and out of the crystals like a mosquito flying along a pond at dusk. When I was a safe distance away, I peered back and saw dozens of crystals falling and rolling down the mountain. As they went, they knocked into each other while others picked up speed. The edge of the chayot town wasn't far. Everything in their path would be crushed and destroyed. Many lives would end if I didn't do anything. But what?

Jax appeared, his face contorted with worry and his pillowcase hanging from one hand. "What happened?" Fear stretched across his eyes at the inevitable outcome.

I shook my head. "They just began to shake loose. I don't know."

Thomas appeared, but before speaking, he aimed his body at the furthest crystal and closed his wings. He shot down, going rapidly. He was going to try and stop them, but how could he? I went after him.

Jax dropped his pillowcase and followed.

But we were too late. Thomas reached the largest one and sent a light green light from his hands and into the rock. Subconsciously I knew it was his angel power. At the same moment, I also knew he wasn't strong enough. The crystal rolled over Thomas like he wasn't even there.

"Thomas," I shouted and pushed faster.

On her own, Faith transformed from my bracelets and into a sword. Use me to control your power, Alice, she shouted into my head.

At seeing Wrythe, I'd forgotten about her and my powers. But as soon as Faith said the words, my abilities roared to life. The demon and the angelic combined to form a golden-white light. It shoved through me and out of my hands into the sword—Faith—, and she flamed to life. Without thinking, I flung the blade into the crystal. It sunk deep into the glass as veins of golden light cracked through, and it shattered into thousands of pieces.

Faith returned to my hand like a boomerang, and I flung her at the next one. She shattered it, and we continued the work until all the crystals were nothing more than rubble.

The rumbling stopped, and my shoulders sagged.

Faith returned to my hands and became my bracelets once again as I dove down to search for Thomas.

“Thomas.” I called his name over and over until I heard moaning. Heading in that direction, I saw part of one of his fawn brown wings poking through some of the debris. “I’m coming.” I landed and used my hands to dig at the clear rocks.

Faith once again transformed into small twin swords. There isn’t time to dig. Use your power.

I called it forth, and it radiated out of me, through the blades and into the ground.

Like a giant puff of wind, the rocks dissipated, revealing the wounded angel. His eyes were closed, and blood trickled from his head, arms, and torso. He looked like a broken doll.

“What have I done?” Faith was back around my wrists in a flash as I touched Thomas’s shoulder. Immediately, some of my power flowed into him. But this time, it was to heal instead of destroying. In moments, the golden light that was my power filtered through Thomas until he shone briefly and then went back to himself, completely whole.

Thomas opened his eyes.

“Hi,” I said and smiled, sticking out my free hand.

He took it and used his wings as well as my help to get off the ground. “What happened?” he asked.

I wanted to explain, but his eyes went wide, and he focused on a point beyond me.

“Alice,” he whispered.

Nervous, I turned around. There were at least a dozen sentinel chayot standing there, swords were drawn, and their angelic power radiating. There were seven colors, but they were softer than those of the demon counterpart. Each chayot also wore an expression of anger stood, ready to fight.

“I’m sorry,” I said just as Jax flew down and landed. He looked at me with kindness, and a balm of humility washed through me at the way Jax cared. I appreciated his support even though I didn’t deserve it. I’d nearly destroyed part of the chayot sector. A quick glance up at the peak revealed I had damaged something the chayot were proud of.

Thomas flanked my other side.

“All you were to do was collect the crystals,” the leader said, sarcasm heavy in his words. “I knew it was a mistake to let you into our sector.” He eyed me like I was a squished worm on the bottom on his boot.

Faith was itching to fight, but I kept her calm. “Where’s Veronica and Leia?” I asked, not wanting to push the angel, but worried too.

“They are being escorted back to the Academy, which is what we intend to do with you.” He lifted into the air. “You will stay with us and not veer even the slightest. Do you understand?”

I swallowed. “Yes.”

I let Jax and Thomas go in front of me, and I took off after them. The chayot surrounded us like we were hardened criminals. And I guess we kind of were. Or at least I was. There had to be something I could do to make up for the devastation I caused.

The power you used to obliterate those crystals can also be used to create new ones, Faith said. You possess both the ability to annihilate and to restore. Balance, remember?

Jax hovered a moment, letting Thomas fly past him, and then he was beside me. His features soft, but his eyes were apprehensive. “What you did…” He shook his head. “That kind of power…” He was struggling to find the words. “Where did you get that weapon?”

“It’s hard to explain,” I said softly.

“Where is it now?”

Faith kept warning me not to tell anyone the truth, and after all I’d learned about my father, I thought it best to keep Faith a secret. “It’s safe.”

“No talking,” one of the chayot barked.

We flew the rest of the way in silence, but I knew Jax, and I would have a serious conversation about what happened at some point.

As soon as we entered the Seraph Academy’s air space, I saw Aaryn and Kade waiting on the roof. Neither looked happy. Part of me wanted to fly away. Head to the Welcome Station and make Tillie send me home. But I had a feeling I wouldn’t be allowed to leave. There had to be consequences for my actions.

So I kept quiet and decided to accept whatever penalties the headmaster and my new teacher decided to dish out. No matter what, I wouldn’t let the others take the blame for what I’d done.

The lead chayot landed and spoke with Kade and Aaryn. Their voices were hushed, but I got the feeling they were arguing. Veronica and Leia weren’t around. Probably sent to their rooms already. I went to stand in front of Jax and Thomas, but they wouldn’t let me, and I was about to get frustrated with them, but the lead chayot took off, and the rest followed.

Kade’s eyes met mine. Surprisingly, they weren’t furious but interested.

Aaryn, on the other hand, looked ready to melt us with her gaze. “What happened?” she snapped. She wasn’t focused on me but Jax since he was the team leader.

He stepped forward. “I’m unsure. Alice figured out how to retrieve the smaller crystals and went to tell Veronica and Leia. Not too long after that, while Thomas and I were filling our bags, the crystals began to shake and started to fall. Thomas and I barely escaped, and we hurried to find the others.” He paused and glanced back at Thomas and I. “Are Veronica and Leia okay?”

“They’re fine. Shaken but unharmed,” Aaryn responded. “But the three of you? How could you? If the chayot didn’t have family attending the Academy, we would be in serious trouble. As it is, there will be a tribunal to discuss my teaching methods, not to mention headmaster Everett’s leadership skills.” The words left her mouth like she was spitting nails, and each one caused me to flinch. “There will be serious consequences for the three of you. We will discuss it and get back to you.” She crossed her arms. “Now, go to your rooms until you are called.” She was about to turn, but I stopped her.

“Ma’am,” I began, pushing in front of Jax. “It wasn’t Jax or Thomas’s fault. They were brave and courageous and are excellent friends.” I paused and closed my eyes a moment. “But they didn’t do anything wrong. It was all my fault.”

Jax tried to interrupt, but I cut in over him.

“Yes, Jax was the team leader, but I didn’t listen and… engaged with a voice in the crystals. That’s when they began to quake, and that’s why they fell. It’s totally on me.” I clasped my hands together, as though I was praying. “Please do not punish them. Please.” I pleaded with her, and when she didn’t respond, I glanced at Kade. “Ka-Headmaster Everett, I swear to you this is all on me.”

He ground his teeth together.

Aaryn glanced back at him, and he nodded. “We will take what you’ve said into consideration. You are excused.”

I nodded and hung my head as I turned to go.

“Alice, you will meet me in my office in ten minutes after I speak with Miss Aaryn.” Kade’s eyes drilled into mine, but I agreed.

Except I didn’t know the location. “Where’s—”

“It’s Raphael’s old office,” he quipped before I could finish. “Now go.”

I followed after Jax and Thomas, taking to the air and landing in the courtyard below. “I am really sorry, guys,” I said, but couldn’t meet their eyes.

“Hey,” Thomas patted me on the arm. “No big deal. Class isn’t real until someone almost dies. If it had to be anyone, I’m glad it was me.”

He was smiling, and I felt myself relax. “Thank you, Thomas. But whatever I can do to make it up to you—” I turned to Jax. “Both of you, just let me know.”

“It’s fine, Alice, really,” Jax added. “Thomas is right. No one got really hurt.”

You still have a crystal in your pocket, Faith said.

She’d been quiet, and I flinched when she spoke. Oh yeah. I reached into my pocket and pulled out the single crystal. “Here,” I said. “At least we got one.”

They both started laughing, and Jax took it.

“I’ll be sure to show this to Aaryn. Technically, I think we completed the mission. Even if it was messy.”

A shadow appeared above us, and we all looked up in time to see Kade soaring overhead.

“I guess I better go talk to the headmaster,” I whispered, tucking my hands in my pockets.

“You’ll be fine,” Jax said, giving me a reassuring smile.

“I mean, he might strip you of your powers, but that’s highly unlikely for your first offense,” Thomas added, winking to show me he was joking.

“Thanks.” I turned and headed in the same direction as Kade. Inside, I went over to the elevator. The same warrior guard who’d walked me up to Raphael’s office was there.

“Alice,” he said.

“Deacon,” I returned, which surprised him.

“You remembered,” he said, his voice flat.

We rode up in the elevator in silence. When the doors opened, I didn’t wait for Deacon to walk me to the door and knocked as soon as I got there.

“I see your anxious to be punished. Feisty, even.” His eyes roamed down my body and back up again. “I like that in my angels. Maybe you and I could hang out sometime?”

“I’m engaged,” I said and was about to knock again.

“Yeah, but he’s half-demon. They don’t count.”

Anger roared to life, along with my power.

Easy, Alice. He’s doing it on purpose, Faith said.

I guessed she was right, but I didn’t care. “Shut your filthy mouth,” I seethed, using my wings to be eye level with him. “The man I’m engaged to is a king, and you’d do well to show some respect.”

He returned my anger with his own, and he shoved me. “Don’t talk to me like that! I don’t care what some of them think you are of what you’re prophesied to do. I know the truth. That your nothing more than a stinking rat.” He went to spit, but before he could, Kade opened the door.

“That’ll be all, Deacon. You are excused.”

It looked like Deacon wanted to comment, but didn’t dare. “Fine.” He stalked away.

When he was gone, Kade’s features softened. “Come in. Let’s talk about the consequences.”

OceanofPDF.com

AS SOON AS I was inside his office and the door was closed, Kade went over to his desk but didn't sit. "Talk to me about what happened and don't leave out a single detail," he said, picking up a book, but not opening it.

Even though I knew this was the same office Raphael had been in, it looked completely different. Where Raphael kept everything white and very minimalistic, Kade's reminded me of Professor Pops'. The walls covered in deep brown bookshelves filled with old books. And there were strange statues as well as ancient weapons leaning against a stand to be displayed. He was a collector of artifacts as well as books. How interesting.

"Alice," he barked, interrupting my thoughts.

"Fine," I said and went over to one of the chairs. I was exhausted.

"Thank you." He smiled, but it wasn't sexy like it used to be. Instead, it looked very head master-ish.

I clasped my hands together and rested them in my lap. Then told him everything about Wrythe, our kiss, and Faith. He appeared to restrain himself from asking questions but succeeded in waiting until I was finished.

"You called the sword you used Faith?" He shook his head. "You named it?"

You can tell him, Faith said. I sense he is one of the best.

Thank you. "She is called by many names. You might have heard Sword of Uriel, Sword of War, Flaming Sword, or Burning Stick?"

Kade's eyes widened. "Are you telling me the sword you took from the Fallen leader yesterday is the original sword?" He had to sit then and fell into his seat.

"That's right," I admitted quietly.

“It figures.” He placed the book on his desk and rested his head in his hands. “Alice, do you know what this means?”

I thought I did. “Does it have something to do with my father and the prophecy?”

He looked at me then, and there was a pain in his eyes. “Where is the weapon now?”

I leaned forward and rested my hands on the edge of his desk. Faith wanted to show off. She writhed from my wrists and formed into a blade between Kade and me.

“Unbelievable,” he whispered and touched it.

“She talks to me too,” I admitted, wondering what he would think.

“That doesn’t surprise me,” he said, stroking the blade lightly.

Tell him I think he’s impressive, Faith said. She obviously had a crush on Kade. I knew what that felt like.

“She wants you to know she thinks you’re amazing,” I said, giving him a grim smile.

He returned it, though wearily. “You must never tell a soul you have this sword. Do you understand me?”

“Yes,” I said, and swallowed. Faith said the same thing. “I know what this sword represents.”

“Good.” He stood and picked up the book and went over to the bookshelf, where he slid it between to other old and dusty books. Then he faced me. “I have to punish you for what you did.”

“I wouldn’t expect anything less.” I nodded as Faith returned to my wrists. “Whatever you need to do, I understand.”

“Good. Just know it isn’t going to be comfortable.” He returned to his seat. “In fact, you might think it too harsh a punishment, but the chayot leader will accept nothing less, and it must be done to appease him.” He eyed me warily.

“It’s okay, Kade. I nearly killed a bunch of angels. I get that the punishment needs to be severe. Do what you must.” I sat back, feeling a flutter of nerves run through my veins.

Faith wasn't thrilled. You saved them all, she huffed.

Yes, but I almost killed them all first. We will be alright, Faith.

"She's speaking to you now, isn't she?" Kade asked.

"She thinks you should be lenient because I didn't let any of the chayot get hurt." I bit my bottom lip, refusing to say more, though Faith had a lot more to say. Shush, I ordered. She wasn't having it.

What if he strips you of your powers?

He won't.

"I am going to be as lenient as I can." He ran his hands through his hair. "Hyneth wanted me to strip you of your powers…" His voice trailed off. "As if I could," he added. "I told him that would not happen, but that I would imprison you for the next thirty days."

"Angel prison? What's that like?"

"It probably won't bother you at all. The cell looks a lot like your room in Demonland," he said with a chuckle. "I'll make sure to bring your books. You can do your bookwork down there and continue to learn what you are meant to learn."

"Fine," I said, "But there's one more thing you should know."

He shook his head and leaned back in his chair, slumping his shoulders. "What is it?"

"Catherine saw us kissing. She demanded I give her the original sword in exchange for her silence." My cheeks grew hot as I thought about the hologram. "She has holographic proof, too. I saw it."

Kade sat up, grinding his teeth together. "Nothing is ever easy—"

There was a knock at the door, and it opened.

A stunning and beautiful angel walked in. Her hair was the same color as mine, but it was much longer, hanging past her hips, and it was curled at the ends. Her wings weren't out, but if they matched her eye color like the other angels, they would be deep violet with flecks of sunflower yellow.

“Sorry to barge in,” she began, walking over to Kade like a ballerina. Her eyes were locked on him like he was the sun and the moon. It was sweet, actually.

“Mari.” Kade stood and met her, taking both her hands in his. “I said I would be there as soon as I could.”

Mari glanced over at me. “Yes, but when I heard you were meeting with Alice, I had to meet her.” She released Kade and came over to me, pulling me up and into a hug. “Hi,” she said. “I’ve heard so much about you.”

For some reason, I expected malice or even a bit of jealousy, but there was only kindness on her face. It was a bit irritating if I were honest. “Hello,” I responded, keeping my emotions in check.

Kade stood to the side of us, his eyes flicking back and forth. “Allow me to introduce my fiancé, Mari Mayholden.” He smiled, and it was genuine.

Mari hugged me again. “You are even more beautiful than Kade described,” she said and gave Kade an aggravated look. “We could almost be sisters.”

I wasn’t going to say that, but it was true. We did look a lot alike. “I don’t think so,” I said, trying to find some humility. “You are much more beautiful, but thank you.” My heart was racing. I was feeling uncomfortable.

“You must join us for dinner. My parents will be thrilled to have you.” She released my hands and rested them on Kade’s shoulder, leaning into him and resting her head.

“Thank you for the invitation, but…” I wasn’t sure what to say.

Kade filled her in.

“Oh, that’s terrible,” she said as Kade walked her to the door. “See you soon, Alice.” She went out of the door, and Kade closed it.

“I’m sorry about that,” he said.

“It’s okay. She really is beautiful and seems very nice. The two of you make a perfect pair." I rummaged around in my feelings to see if I meant it, and I did.

"Thank you." Kade went back over to his desk, his face a mask of seriousness. "You're sentence begins now." He pressed a button on his desk, and the floor opened.

"What am I supposed to do?" I peered down into what looked like a tunnel.

"This channel is direct access to your prison cell."

I swallowed, suddenly nervous. "Will there be others in there with me?"

"No, you will be all alone, I'm afraid."

I'll be there with you, Alice. You always have me.

That means a lot, Faith.

"I should relieve you of your weapon, but I have a feeling she wouldn't allow that, so please do not try to escape. That will only make things worse." Kade came around his desk and stood beside the hole. "Let me help you," he said, holding out a hand.

"That isn't necessary." I kept my head held high and went over, sitting on the edge. From that angle, I could see that it curved down, but it was impossible to tell how far down it went. Surely not any farther down than I'd been in Demonland. It was going to be okay. "What about Catherine?"

"You needn't worry about her. If she doesn't see things my way, I'll strip her of her powers and send her to dwell with the Fallen like her father."

"Who's her father?" I asked, curious, and trying to procrastinate.

"Raphael," he said. "Now go on. The chayot leader is waiting for me to confirm you have been imprisoned."

"Fine." I pushed off.

It was like a slide. Thankfully, it didn't go too quickly, and I slid into the room on my butt without any pain. Then the slide tunnel vanished. Kade was right. It did look almost exactly like my room in Demonland. Except for no spider, I thought, glancing up at the corner of the room. There were other differences, too, like that the walls weren't made of dirt and were painted white. There was a bed and a dresser as well as a little bedside table with a lamp.

What if he forgets about us? Faith asked, sounding worried.

It wasn't a bad question. We'll be fine, I said.

And we were, I guess. But after three weeks, I was starting to go a little crazy. Mainly because each night, I had the oddest dreams. At first, they were about angels operating on me or poking me, or dissecting me. Each morning I woke with an awful feeling. But after the first week, the dreams shifted to me running through a meadow with a little girl holding my hand. We were laughing and happy, and then Wrythe would swoop in and lift the little girl into the air.

Those were the worst because my heart ached for Wrythe and the possibilities.

It was the same on the first morning of my fourth week in incarceration. Tears leaked onto my pillow.

Another dream about Wrythe? Faith asked.

Yes, I admitted, because there wasn't a point lying about it. Rolling onto my side, my Angels 101 book fell from my chest onto the floor. I'd gone to sleep while reading. That happened a lot.

In the weeks since I'd been left in here, Kade had visited and brought me things. He also said that Jax and the others wanted to visit, but they weren't allowed. That filled my heart with a semblance of peace. They really did care.

I climbed out of bed and went to drop so I could start my push-ups, but there was a fluttering in my belly, and I was suddenly lightheaded. The feeling was new and left me dizzy. I fell back onto the bed, touching my head with my hand.

What's wrong?

Nothing. I grabbed hold of my stomach, and the fluttering danced through my belly again. It literally felt like butterfly wings brushed inside of me. What the hell was happening? I forced myself upright, and the dizziness hit me full throttle along with an intense bout of queasiness. Though I hadn't eaten since the day before, I rushed to the bathroom to throw up.

Alice, Faith barked. Tell me the truth.

I don't know what's wrong, I said, lying on the floor. I've never felt like this a day in my life. I'm half-demon and half-angel. I'm not supposed to get sick. Once, one of the kids I was in foster care with had the flu and threw up all night. That was the only reason I knew I must be sick.

Questions whirled in my mind. Was I being poisoned somehow? Or breathing bad air? I really didn't know, but I needed to talk with Kade. The problem was a door only appeared once a day when my food was delivered or when Kade came to speak with me. Otherwise, there were only four walls. Literally no way out. I moaned.

There is a way out, silly girl. Use your power. Bust us out of here. You can do it.

I hadn't realized I said the last part to Faith. But I promised, I uttered, before another round of nausea hit.

Something is wrong. You need help. I have no doubt that if Kade knew you were sick, he would understand.

She wasn't wrong, but I couldn't do it. My oath meant something, and I refused to break it. Rinsing my mouth in the sink, I went back to bed. Faith kept at it until I lost my temper. I'll say something when my food arrives if I'm not feeling better. Okay?

Fine. She wasn't happy with me, but let me sleep until the scrape of my tray moving across the floor woke me. And I felt better—no more nausea. But I was thirsty.

"Food," the voice on the other end of the tray said.

"Can I have some more water?" I asked, my throat scratchy.

“What for?” He barked.

“I’ve been sick,” I said, then picked up the water glass, drank it all, and stuck it in the little slot.

“I’ll see what I can do.”

There were footsteps, and I heard him walk away. Then padding as he walked up what sounded like stairs. I went over and peered out the slot. Sure enough, there was a long hallway with a staircase at the end. For some reason, seeing that freedom was so close brought my powers to life.

That’s it, Alice. Come on. I want out of this hole.

I did too, but I made a promise and refused to break it. Taking a deep breath, I worked to stabilize my power. Over the last three weeks, I had plenty of time to practice control, and I used my time wisely.

You are disappointing, Faith grumbled.

Get over it, I said, and bit into an apple that sort of tasted like strawberries and bananas combined. As I chewed, I heard footfalls on the stairs. Whoever it was, they were coming quickly. A waist, shoulders, and head appeared. It was Deacon. He handed me a full glass of water. “Drink up,” he said after closing the slot.

The door disappeared, and I was alone once again.

It was like that for the next three days. In the morning, I felt the strange fluttering in my stomach, followed by nausea. Where I would spend hours in the bathroom sick. Then I would sleep it off and be fine by the time my food came.

Faith thought I might die, but I started to get a sneaking suspicion it was something else.

I was pregnant.

The possibility had my heart springing between terrifying fear and blissful excitement.

That I could be carrying Wrythe’s child.

On the morning of the fourth day, I was still in bed when Kade arrived without preamble or even a courtesy knock. “Deacon just told me you’ve been sick,” he said.

I opened my eyes, groggy, and immediately the world started to spin. “A little,” I admitted, trying not to move. That helped.

“You’re pale, and you look dehydrated. I’m taking you to the Healing Center.” Without waiting for me to reply, he lifted me into his arms and carried me down the hall and up the stairs.

I wasn’t dressed, and the demon orb and blade were still under my pillow. “Wait,” I hissed, trying not to move.

He stopped. “What is it?”

“My things,” I said.

“What things?”

I carefully opened my eyes. “The demon orb and my blade,” I said softly.

“It won’t do to leave those.” He rushed back into the room. I lifted the pillow and retrieved my stuff.

“How is it some of the most powerful artifacts in all the realms are in your possession?” There was surprise in his voice, but he didn’t appear to want an answer.

I had to do all I could not to puke on his uniform.

OceanofPDF.com

I WAS KEPT in the Healing Center under guard for the rest of my week. It seemed like overkill, but whatever. They could do what they wanted. The Healer caring for me was Celeste. She revealed what I already knew. I was pregnant. The news caused quite a ruckus.

Angels could procreate but only when given special approval from the higher-ups—the Heavenly Harbingers.

I'd broken another rule. Surprise. Surprise.

The hospital room I was sequestered in was a lot nicer than the prison. Best of all, my friends were allowed to visit. They all came together the day after I arrived.

Thankfully, Celeste gave me something to help with the nausea, so I was able to talk with them without feeling the need to puke. That was a relief.

"I can't believe you're pregnant," Leia said, sounding envious. Her eyes flashed to my belly.

"Me either," I admitted. "It wasn't planned."

Jax took my hand. "But you're okay?"

Warmth radiated through to my heart. I had a brother, and he actually liked me. "I'm good. Thanks, Jax."

He didn't look convinced.

"Really," I added.

"I still can't believe they sent you to angel jail for a month," Thomas said, his voice gentle.

"It wasn't bad," I admitted. "At least not until I got morning sickness."

"My mom said she had it with me and that it was the worst. She couldn't fly. She could barely move until she was on the medication Celeste prescribes." Veronica smiled sweetly.

“Yeah, I’m thankful for that medicine, too,” I said, taking a deep breath.

“You coming back to class on Monday?” Thomas asked.

Nerves skimmed along my veins. “Are you sure that’s a good idea? I mean, I caused a bunch of trouble.”

“True,” Thomas said and laughed. “But it’s been a total snooze fest without you.” He reached around about patted my calf. “We need you.”

“Thomas is right,” Jax agreed, squeezing my hand.

Tears threatened, and I blinked, looking away until I had myself under control. “I guess it’s up to the headmaster,” I said, hoping he would let me return.

Deacon appeared in the doorway and told my friends to leave.

After they said goodbye, I closed my eyes.

There was a rustling outside the door, and then it opened. Catherine stood there, her brown hair wild and her eyes red like she’d been crying. Her angel power sizzled and sparked red along her fingers. “You,” she hissed. Her feet were spread apart, as were her wings. She looked cracked crazy, and I sat up.

“Catherine, what’s wrong?” I asked carefully.

“You told Kade,” she said, in between ragged breaths. “I told you not to do that.” The red of her angel power grew and hovered above her hands.

“I had to because I wasn’t going to meet your deadline since I was in jail,” I said, trying to keep her calm. But something protective and sinister rose up amid my power. It was gold but also laced with darkness. Without a doubt, I refused to let her hurt my child. Wrythe’s child. I would protect this baby with my life.

“Our beloved headmaster,” she began spitting out each word like they tasted bad. “He tried to reason with me. Said he was trying to help me. But all he wanted was to keep me silent.” She removed the remote-looking thing that held the hologram with the incriminating evidence of Kade, and I kissing and went over to what looked like a laptop though I guessed it was beyond that. “I’m going to show the realm what kind of angel you are.” She paused and looked at my stomach. “Nothing but a rat carrying demon spawn.” Then she smiled. “The higher-ups will destroy you, and I’ll sit back and happily watch.”

My heart was pounding in my chest so hard it almost hurt. “Don’t do this, Catherine. Please.” I wasn’t worried about me so much as Kade. What she had on that hologram would ruin him.

“You are in no position to tell me what to do. Unless you have the sword—”

Dark smoke filled the room along with black lightning and crackling thunder. Catherine froze, as my father appeared at the end of my bed.

Catherine gasped and stumbled, trying to get to the door. “I know who you are,” she mumbled. “The Devil is in the angel realm. That isn’t right. You can’t be here. Get out. Get out!” Her words all ran together like she was talking to herself instead of me. She reached the handle and went to open it, but her hand froze midway there. “I can’t move,” she eked out.

I scooted up. “Let her go,” I shouted, my power flaring to life.

He looked at me, an evil smile on his face. “Relax, Alice. I sent you here to find out about the prophecy and become educated regarding the angels.”

Confusion beat inside my chest. “What am I supposed to learn?”

Faith kept whispering that I should use her to end him, but I continued to ignore her.

“Come now, Alice. Surely you must know.” His slimy smile grew. “Even the supposedly virtuous angels can be wicked.” When he finished speaking, he clapped his hands together once.

Immediately, Catherine turned to sparkling red dust. Her remains rained down out of the air and onto the floor—except the remote. That dropped onto the stark white floor with a tiny thud.

A strangled sob wrenched from my throat and sorrow filled my heart. I jumped out of bed. “She didn’t need to die,” I choked, breathing heavily.

The Devil bent over and retrieved the remote, tucking it into the front pocket of his bright green pants. “Where’s my thank you? I just saved you and my dearest frenemy from an enormous about of embarrassment. Especially now that Kade is married.” He nodded, knowingly, and studied my features.

My whole body shook. The Devil was goading me. Torturing me. And enjoying every moment of it.

Let me end him now, Faith said, the marks on my hands shining brightly.

I tucked my hands behind my back. If he dies, then I die too, I said, repeating what Kade told me and wishing it weren’t true. Then to my father, I asked, “Why have you come? It can’t be time already.”

His smile deepened, sending small crinkles around his eyes. “Actually—”

Kade burst into the room, his eyes alight with righteous indignation. “Depart,” he shouted, his nose flaring, and his wings were extended as far as they could go inside the enclosed space.

The Devil rolled his eyes before settling his gaze on me. “Either you finish your third trial or every Dark Moth, including your dear fiancé, will die. I have that power, Alice. You know, I do.”

“I will,” I said, wishing my knees weren’t trembling so strongly. “But I need more time.” I didn’t want to beg, but I would. There were still things I had to finish. “Please.”

“I order you to leave, Deckland! You are not welcome here,” Kade roared, his voice sounding like thunder.

My father snapped his fingers and was gone. But I heard him whisper one word. “Soon.”

When the Devil was gone, Kade ruffled his feathers before they settled on his back. “Are you okay?” He held out his hands like I was a broken bird and would attack if I felt threatened. He wasn’t totally wrong.

“I’m fine,” I said through clenched teeth. Because part of me was angry with Kade too. He got married, and I wasn’t able to be there. Though come to think of it, that was probably for the best.

“Why don’t you get some rest,” Kade said. “I’ll be back in a few moments.” He left the room, and I heard him barking orders to Deacon in a low voice. Minutes later, two male angels in gray uniforms came in and swept up Catherine’s remains, placing them in a ruby box before wrapping it inside what looked like satin material. They didn’t speak to me. Didn’t talk to each other. Just came in. Did their job. And left.

That gave me time to figure out what I needed to do. By the time Kade returned, I had decided to make sure I fulfilled the prophecy and fixed Crystal Peak before anything else. I couldn’t leave the angel realm until both jobs were done, whatever they entailed.

“How are you?” Kade asked once we were alone.

“Freaked out, if you want to know the truth.” I wasn’t sure whether it was because of my hormones or something else, but at seeing him, panic and anxiety built in my chest. As did my power, licking against my bones and sinews like it was waiting to rage out.

What’s wrong? Faith asked.

I don’t know. Baby hormones. Is that a thing?

Oh yeah. I’ve seen it, and from what I’ve heard, it’s worse in angels than it is in humans. Deep breaths. You don’t want to burn the Healing Center to the ground.

Right, I said and hoped I wasn’t making a face.

Kade tilted his head to one side and ran a hand through his hair. A flash of metal on his ring finger caught my attention and sent my anxiety into overdrive, so I was glowing.

Kade considered me like I was a new creature. “Should I leave? Call Celeste to give you something? You seem…” He didn’t finish, and it was a good thing.

I took a deep breath. “No,” I said, blowing out. Then I breathed in through my nose. “So you’re married?” I indicated his ring with my chin.

He glanced at it. “Here we call it joined instead of married. Because Mari and I will be together eternally, not until death do us part.”

“Well, where is she then?” I snapped and then took another deep breath. Blew out. “Sorry.” A pang of humility brought me back into the almost calm range. “I’m very happy for you both.”

“Thank you, Alice,” he said. “I didn’t want to join with her until after you were released, but the plans were in place, and Mari didn’t want to change them.” He glanced down at his hands. “It was probably for the best anyway.”

“Yeah, probably,” I admitted. It was almost comical the way we were both avoiding speaking about what had happened to Catherine because of the damned Devil.

“You’ll be released as soon as you’re ready. It’s silly to keep you any longer.” He paused. “If that’s okay?”

“Yeah, I’m ready to be free again. Definitely.” I decided to take the leap and bring up my dad and what he did. “Did the… Deckland really kill Catherine?” I asked, my voice quiet.

He nodded, his eyes falling to his wedding ring, and he twisted the band. “Though it wasn’t her Final Death. If the higher-ups want her to return to the realm, they can and will. I hope they don’t.” He held up his hand. “If my Mari were to see us—the way we kissed when you first arrived—that would hurt her, and I don’t want that. I’m sure you feel the same way about Wrythe?” He dropped his hands.

I felt that if I explained why I kissed Kade and how it closed the door entirely on my old feelings for him, then Wrythe would understand. Because then he would know that I was truly his, but I didn't say that. When the time was right, I intended to tell Wrythe all of it. "Something like that," I admitted.

"And Catherine was crazy. Literally. It's better if she remains where she is and not here in the angel realm."

"As long as she is at peace and isn't suffering?"

Kade shook his head, and reached out, wrapping my hands in his. "You really are special, Alice. And that is why I know for certain you are the one the prophecy is talking about. You truly are the best of all of us."

I pulled my hands from his grasp. "What do I need to do to make the prophecy come to pass?"

Kade stepped back, a flash of frustration crossing his face. "I don't know," he admitted. "I'm still searching. While you were incarcerated, I did a lot of research. Not once does it say how the prophecy will happen. Only that it will." He rubbed the back of his neck. "I'm worried. Because you have the third trial to complete. What is it?" He already knew, but wanted me to say it. I could tell.

I thought about all he said and the third trial. "I have to give up the most precious part of myself to save someone I love," I repeated.

Kade's shoulders turned in. "Now that you're pregnant." He paused, and his eyes went to my belly. Of course, I wasn't showing you. "The implications…" He struggled to finish.

Freaking frack! Had my father known I would get pregnant? Did he expect me to give up my baby? At the thought, a jolt of power burst along my veins, and I gold radiated from my pores.

"I know," Kade said. "We need a plan." Then he stepped back. "I mean, you need a plan, and I'll do everything to help. Of course. As the headmaster of the Seraph Academy, that is my duty." He seemed to be convincing himself as well as me that it was okay for us to continue to spend time together. I wouldn't turn him down. The angel realm was still new. I'd spent more time in jail than actually getting to know what was here. His help was more than needed, it was required.

Tears filled my eyes. So much had changed, but I could handle it. "Thanks, Kade. I'm so glad I met you." I blinked several times, knowing now wasn't the time to break down. Baby hormones would have to suck it. "If you can't find anything, it might be a good idea to talk to Professor Pops or even Abernathy. The dragon has been around a long time. Maybe he can help me discover what I need to do to fulfill the angel prophecy and make sure I don't lose my baby in the final trial." I jumped out of bed, desperate to do anything but lie around and wait. My father was gone. I had no idea when he would return, but I couldn't worry about that. I needed to talk to the dragon. "Can you make that happen?"

"You mean you leave the angel realm?" He appeared distracted.

"Yes, temporarily." Surely he could see the benefit and could sense my urgency.

Kade swallowed, lifting a brow. "I think we should try something else." He crossed his arms, looking slightly uncomfortable.

"Anything."

"I think we should try having you speak with the higher-ups?" His eyes found mine, and he held them.

"The Heavenly Harbingers?" That was a good idea. The prophecy came from them, didn't it? It stood to reason they would provide answers.

"That's right. But…" He rubbed the back of his neck.

I didn't want to hear excuses or reasons why it wasn't a good idea. Peter used to say when training us that we should go with our gut and listen to our instincts. If the idea came to Kade, then I had to give it a shot. "Let's go right now."

He glanced out the window as though he were deliberating, then seemed to make up his mind. “Get dressed.”

“Where are my clothes?” I searched the room without success.

“I’ll have Deacon bring you some.” He closed his eyes and took another deep breath. When he opened them, I saw the resolve there. “It’s dangerous.” He glanced at my stomach. “The higher-ups don’t like to be bothered. They can come to us, but more than one angel received Final Death because they believed their request important enough to disturb them.”

Don’t worry, Alice. I won’t let anything happen to you or the baby, Faith said. Between us, there isn’t anything that can stand in our way. Not even the Heavenly Harbingers.

I couldn’t help the smile that grew on my face. “I’ll be fine, Kade,” I replied.

He glanced at my hands and the golden bracelets and must’ve guessed Faith said something. “Good.”

OceanofPDF.com

CLOTHED with my white Seraph Academy uniform, Kade and I flew through the archangel sector. The buildings were pristine and shiny, as though they were somehow cleaned and polished each and every day. The grounds surrounding the structures were elegant with lush grass, beautiful trees with leaves as colorful as the flowers growing near them. Including poppies, roses, and peonies. Water fountains shaped liked angels and surrounded by pools shone brightly, their sound repetitive and calming. On their Main Street were shops, their holographic signs advertising wing jewelry, and delicious smelling food. There were clothing stores and bakeries and anything an angel could possibly want, including a unicorn and flying horses as pets.

What the freak? That brought me up short.

"Unicorns are real?" The ad showed an angel child with pale pink wings riding on the back of a white unicorn with a pink horn, mane, and tail. They looked adorable together, and I was curious whether the angel parents purchased the unicorn to match or if it was a mirage. I felt positive my baby would love a unicorn.

The lure of the ad had me turning and heading down so I could see the animals for myself.

"Alice now isn't a good time," Kade said, shaking his head once. He gave me a very passable headmaster stare.

I wanted to sulk but told myself the angel realm wasn't going anywhere. I could check out the unicorns and flying horses another day. "But they are real?" I verified as I came up alongside Kade.

"Absolutely. The unicorns and their flying counterparts originated in the human realm as one of the seven magics. After a time, they were bred with regular horses and about to be extinct, but it's said two of the higher-ups decided to protect them and brought several to live in the angel realm." He shook his head. "They are only allowed to be bred and kept in the archangel sector, and the Pegasus isn't allowed to fly except at night."

That seemed odd. When would a child get a chance to ride one? Not only that, but the commercial showed the child riding her Pegasus during the day. I was going to bring that to Kade's attention, but he went on.

"There are exceptions, of course. Once a month, they are allowed to fly any time during the day. And then there's also Pegasus Day where the archangels hold a flying parade and celebrate their beautiful flying horses." Kade shook his head again.

"Why only once a month?" I felt terrible for those flying horses that weren't allowed to fly except once a week.

"Don't worry. Like in the old-timey human days, the archangels hire Fallen to care for the animals. They allow the horses to fly while tethered to extended leads each night to keep their muscles conditioned."

That still didn't sound very nice. How awful it would be, I thought.

"The reason they aren't allowed to fly whenever is because the archangels don't want to flaunt their animals to the other angels and because too many of the animals were being stolen or led away."

I didn't know what to say but strained to see a Pegasus or a unicorn somewhere along the way. None of them were out. But I did notice several white buildings that looked like barns and guessed they might be in those. Disappointment radiated through me. "I'm sure they're beautiful," I said wistfully.

"They are," Kade said with a smile. "Not only that, but the animals' horns possess healing power. Their magic is used quite often in the Healing Center."

"The animals aren't hurt?" I hoped not.

"Oh, no. The animals, especially the unicorns, are very intelligent. Not only that, but their magic allows us to communicate with them.

Some of the unicorns want to help and actually live in the Healing Center."

"You are destroying my resolve," I said.

Kade chuckled and touched my arm. "I'll introduce you to some of them myself after this is all over. Okay?"

I noted when he touched me, there wasn't a zing. He was genuinely committed to Mari. Whatever romantic feelings he had for me were gone. At least that was how I felt and hoped he did too. "Cool," I said and smiled.

In the distance and poking out above the thick gray mists was the top of a volcano. I guessed it had to be Lava Falls. Flecks of lava would shoot into the air. Some would turn to twinkling dust while others would shimmer into something bright gold and fall.

"Won't we choke on the ash?" I asked, suddenly nervous.

"This volcano is different than those in the human realm. The ash doesn't remain." He pointed out toward the sky above the volcano. I followed his finger just as several particles of ash twinkled and sparkled before vanishing. "See that?"

"What's happening to it?"

"The ash dissipates and actually cleans the air. So, in reality, the air near the volcano is actually cleaner than the air anywhere else in the realm."

I found that hard to believe but decided to trust Kade. We may not be a couple, but we were friends.

We continued on heading directly at the volcano, and it became clear that was where we were going. At the edge of the mist, I because nervous again. It was harder to see, and I didn't know where I was going. "How much further?" I asked, feeling my shoulders tense.

"We're nearly there, but we need to land." He sailed to the ground and tucked his feathers in at his back before vanishing deeper into the mist.

I followed, glancing around, unsure what I expected to see. “Kade.”

“I’m here.” He reappeared directly in front of me.

All around us were shadows. Some of them appeared to be walking around while others flew. Worse than the shadows was the whispering. Words I couldn’t understand. As though they were pretending to talk. I strained to understand them.

The souls of the dead, Faith hissed.

What are they saying? I clenched my hands into fists and settled my wings at my back.

Nothing good, Faith said flatly.

“Why is there mist around the angel realm?” I whispered, edging up to Kade, nervously.

He stopped walking and gave me a sideways glance. “There aren’t many who know the truth, but since you are who the prophecy was written about, it would be stupid not to tell you.” He cleared his throat. “It isn’t really mist, but the souls of the dead.”

The truth was worse than I expected, and I let that sink in. “Why are they whispering?” I didn’t like the idea of touching dead angels’ souls with every step. The deeper I went, the thicker the soul mist got until I felt like I was suffocating.

“You can hear them?” Kade tilted his head, listening for a moment. “I can’t hear anything.” He gave me a sorrowful smile.

“I can’t understand what they are saying.” My hands hurt from clenching them so tightly and I uncurled them.

“That’s probably for the best.” He continued forward. “Let’s hurry. The contact point is in here.”

I stayed close to his side, worried I might get lost. It wouldn’t be hard, especially since it felt like the souls worked to infiltrate my body. And suddenly, an arched entrance appeared in front of us.

Kade heaved a great sigh. “We’re here.” He stepped under the archway and vanished.

“Wait,” I called and promptly followed.

Instantly, my surroundings changed. The harsh and incessant babbling of the souls was gone, and it was easy to see once again. We were in a room similar to the one at the Welcome Station. All white with minimal furniture. The only thing in the room was an oversized oval mirror, the edge covered in golden filigree.

Kade stood to the right of the mirror-like he was afraid to look. I didn’t share his worries and walked right up to it.

“Don’t,” Kade said, trying to grab my arm.

“It’s fine.” I gently shoved him but was distracted. My reflection didn’t reflect what I was wearing. Instead of a white uniform, I wore a sleek gold dress. It shimmered and hugged my body, though not tightly, like liquid gold. Spaghetti straps and a scooped neckline in the front revealed my creamy skin and slight cleavage. I turned and raised my wings and saw the back of the dress was low, with some material pooling just below my waist. The dress was the exact color of my wings at my back. Facing front, I admired my hair, which was in several braids starting at my hairline and going all the way down to the ends—the thickest braid directly on top of my head with several smaller braids along the sides. The style seemed severe for the dress, but I liked it anyway.

“What do you see?” Kade asked, his arms crossed.

I told him about my dress and my hair. As I spoke, Faith in the mirror slinked off my wrists and formed the sword, her blade afire with golden flames that reflected in my eyes. “Frankly, I look bad a.”

He snickered. “On this side of the mirror, your hair is a mess. When’s the last time you brushed it?”

I snorted, but me in the mirror didn’t go along. She just stood there, looking like a warrior. I wanted to be her.

You are her, Faith said. The mirror shows you the purest form of yourself.

Thanks for the vote of confidence. "Why aren't you looking in the mirror?" I asked Kade, giving my reflection a smile. This time she smiled back.

Kade took a step back. "In the past, I have." His words came out quiet.

Was he afraid? "What did you see?" I'd never seen Kade be anything but completely confident.

"What I am today," he said, a reverent wonder tightening his features.

"But that's a good thing." I studied him a moment, waiting for him to reveal more or encourage me or say something. He didn't elaborate. "Okay, so what do I do?"

Kade relaxed and ran a hand over the back of his neck. "The mirror is a portal to the higher-ups. You'll need to knock seven times and wait." He headed back to the far wall as a door appeared.

"Where are you going?" I asked, turning.

"Only those who wish to enter can be in the room." He touched the door. "I'll be waiting just outside the mist for you." Then he gave me a small smile. "I always knew you were meant for great things. Good luck, Alice." A whisper of sadness crossed his features before he went through the door.

Alone, I turned back to my reflection. She looked on, giving me courage. I rapped on the mirror as Kade said. The mirror's glass disappeared. Within was what looked like a hallway or more like a person-sized hole. It smelled like dirt and had roots dangling from the ceiling.

"Not again," I whispered, thinking of the times I followed the white rabbit.

"Enter," a distinctly female voice said.

I hesitated. Was I doing the right thing? If a white rabbit appeared, I would run. Also, I still struggled to do what I was told.

"We're waiting."

The voice sounded kind and not at all impatient.

I've got your back, Faith said.

"I'm going." Breathing in through my nose, I stepped through the mirror. As soon as both feet were on the soft dirt floor, the mirror vanished. In its place was complete darkness. I rolled my shoulders back as my power sparked to life.

Faith, sensing my needs, came together and created a small blade that doubled as a flashlight.

You really are the coolest, I said.

She giggled. Thanks.

With her lighting the way, I pushed through the roots and headed in the only direction I could go. As I went, the dirt-covered walls were suddenly filled with projected images of people—specifically of a little girl with blond hair. I stopped as something about the her felt familiar. A taller boy punched her in the face, causing her nose to bleed. Instead of backing down or crying, the girl punched back.

There was a flash on the other wall had images projected on it too. The same girl trying to make cupcakes for her first friend's birthday. She stood on a chair and turned on the beaters to mix the ingredients, but it got away from her, and the chocolate batter went everywhere, splattering her, her clothes, the cupboards, refrigerator, and counter. A woman came in and began shouting, grabbing her arm and squeezing so hard that her skin was bruised.

I knew this girl.

"This is me," I whispered.

Immediately, the movies changed to other memories. Like the time I aced a spelling test, and the teacher accused me of cheating. Or the time one of my foster brothers tried to force himself on me and I broke his nose.

I walked faster to escape, but the quicker I went, the faster the memories flicked along the walls. Until the day I arrived in Demonland. Peter brought me, and I was there with others just like me. Wendy and Eric. Pam and Gilbert and Georgia. Steve and Leif. At the sight of them, I slowed.

Home, I thought. Even though they weren't kind to me. It had been mostly my fault. I had been too focused on the tasks. Especially when I found out who I was and what I was supposed to do. Then the hardness in my personality thickened, and my purpose grew.

The wall flashed the first time I met Wrythe. His smile was the first genuine one I received. At the sight of him, my heart softened. I missed him. I loved him—more than I ever thought possible.

Are you sure about him? You could have anyone, Faith whispered.

I don't want anyone but Wrythe. No matter what, when this was over, I would marry my Dark Moth king.

Up ahead was another arched opening. Beyond was brightness. It infiltrated the entrance, as though the light were trying to take over the cave's darkness. Before I reached it, someone slinked from the shadows and blocked my path. The light filtered around him so I could only see his outline.

"Hello," I said, lightly, thinking he was supposed to take me through to the other side.

He stepped forward and out of the light, and I was able to see it was Raphael. Catherine's father. The angel who wanted me dead. I stopped. "You will not pass," he seethed. Then his eyes fell to Faith. "That is mine. I will have it, Alice." He reached out to take Faith from my hand.

When his fingers touched mine, I flinched. They were so cold, they stung. His other hand came forward to pry Faith, but I held her fast.

"You cannot have her," I said softly.

Never, Faith said.

As my power grew, so did the light on the blade. His eyes flicked to mine, and he wavered.

I pulled from his grasp and turned the tip of the blade on Raphael. “I’m sorry about what happened to Catherine. You have my sympathies, but this blade is not for you.”

His face twisted with menace. “You’re half-demon and beyond vile. Your words mean nothing,” he said, grasping for the blade.

I stepped out of his reach. “You’re right. I am half demon and totally kick ass. Now get out of my way, or I will end you where you stand.” I didn’t want to kill him, but I would if necessary.

Faith growled her approval and flashed brighter.

He opened his mouth to say something, but before he could utter a syllable, he vanished as though he’d been blinked out of existence or had never been there in the first place.

I shifted my weight, standing taller. Was that me?

Not you, Alice. The Heavenly Harbingers. They are not to be messed with.

Confining my nervous thoughts, I continued forward until I reached the other side. By the time I arrived, I had to raise one hand to shield my eyes. Without overthinking what I was getting myself into, I stepped through.

“Alice Blackburn. We’ve been waiting for you.”

OceanofPDF.com

THE LIGHT DIMMED, revealing a cavernous room, similar in shape to a cave, but everything else was different. The walls were beyond white and almost seemed to glitter. Above was a white dome ceiling, and underfoot was a white floor.

At the far end of the room were two… individuals. The bodies flickered and shifted from corporeal to apparitions. At first, they were standing or floating. Then two thrones appeared—gold and white. Without looking back, they sat, and their bodies seemed to become fully three dimensional.

One was male and the other female. The man's hair was short and jet black. The female's hair was short and seafoam green. They had the same eye color—lavender. He had a scruff of facial hair while the woman had thick lashes. Their faces were angular, and they were slim and had on sleek black clothes.

"Are you—" It sounded like I hadn't spoken in years, and I cleared my throat. "Are you the Heavenly Harbingers?" I expected more after what Faith told me.

They aren't, Faith hissed. But they feel familiar.

That didn't fill me with confidence, and I adjusted my stance, preparing for a battle if necessary.

The male stood. "Put away Faith," he said, lifting one hand and waving it in a soothing motion.

I found my hand dropping to my side without meaning to.

They are the Creators, Faith said. At her words, the blade—she—began to pulse in my hand.

The female walked past the male and stopped directly in front of me. She had long fingers with long nails painted in a color close to her hair, and she reached out and touched the blade. A jolt of power ran from her and into my hand. Up along my arm and down into my chest, piercing my heart.

In an instant, we were no longer in the cavern but literally among the stars.

Floating.

Or flying.

Wings black as the vast universe around us appeared on their backs. They beat slowly as though they weren't needed, but only decoration.

I glanced back and saw my wings were out as well.

Ferocious fear roared through my veins. I didn't need air like regular humans, but surely out here in space, I would die. At my terror, my powers raced along my skin, and I glowed bright golden.

"You're okay, Alice," the female said.

"Why have you brought me here?" I didn't like it, not one bit. I glanced down and saw the Earth, which gave me some semblance of peace, but not much. At least I knew where we were.

"You are the most like us, Alice, and we wanted you to see all your power can do."

"Except that dragon," the male added.

"Abernathy?" I asked, my bottom lip trembling.

Faith was silent as though she had lost her voice.

"That's right. But never mind him. You need to see just how powerful you are." She took the blade from my hand.

Was she saying I could create worlds and a universe? I shuddered at the thought.

The female held the blade sideways in both of her hands. "Faith, come forth," she whispered.

At once, the blade shimmered and transformed into a human girl. Her form radiated golden power a moment before settling. She had blond hair similar to mine. Basically, she looked like my younger twin.

Faith's blue eyes were wide with surprise. "Is this real?" she asked, studying her hands.

"Of course, Faith," the male said and held out his arms. "Daughter."

Faith searched my face, afraid.

"It's okay," I said, trying to comfort her. But I was out of my element and just as thrown off as her.

The male hugged Faith.

She resisted a moment and then sank into him and started to cry. "Father?"

"That's right, child," he cooed, patting her back softly.

The female went over and wrapped her arms around them both. As I watched, the three of them shifted from solid to wispy things and back again.

I felt out of place and was about to turn away when Faith pushed through her parents and rushed me, tugging me into her arms. "Alice," she said.

There was an energy, strange but desirable brushing through her as I hugged her back. "Do you know what's going on?" I asked, momentarily forgetting we were all still in space and that this wasn't the freakiest experience ever.

A moment later, we were back in the white cavern.

I heaved a sigh of relief.

"We did that," Faith said, standing back, her eyes wide with excited understanding. "Our powers combined."

Confusion coursed through me, but before I could clarify, the female spoke.

"That's right," she said, resting a hand on Faith's shoulder. "Together, you are even more amazing than we imagined when we created the prophecy."

“Sometimes we astound ourselves,” the male said, looking at his daughter, and then looking at me. “Brilliant!”

Faith smiled, and I joined her as her parents’ wings disappeared. I sent mine away, as well.

“Thank you,” Faith said.

“But how?” I asked, wanting answers to all of my questions.

The two chairs were still there, but the next instant, there was also a table filled with delicate fruits and opulent vegetables along with steaming loaves of bread and goblets filled with something refreshing plus two more chairs.

“Have a seat, both of you,” the female said. “We have much to discuss.”

Faith went over and sat. I joined her, planting my hands in my lap as Faith popped a piece of fruit in her mouth before she began piling food on her plate.

When the Creators were also seated, I glanced over at them from under my eyelashes, curious about what they would say or do next.

The male leaned forward. “Introductions are in order, so you don’t have to continue calling us male and female in your head,” he said with a sharp smile before biting into a strawberry.

“Oh, that’s a good idea,” the female said.

Faith nodded but didn’t speak, her mouth full of food.

I guessed it was her first time eating, and she was enjoying herself.

“You may call me Syne, and my beloved eternal partner is Gwenthe,” the male said.

“I like that,” Gwenthe said, picking up a roll, tearing off a piece and chewing it slowly.

As I watched, I got the feeling they changed their names as well as their appearance at least as often as night turned into day.

“The name is as lovely as you are, Beloved.” Syne kissed Gwenthe’s hand, and she smiled.

Then Gwenthe faced me. “Now then, you had questions. You wanted to know how Faith became a person who looks like you.” She blinked, and I nodded.

“I am wondering that too,” Faith said in between bites.

“Before we get to that, let us ask you a question, Alice,” Syne said.

Nervous, I picked up something that looked like a carrot and took a bite. Chewed. It didn’t taste like a carrot, but it was still good. When I finished, I set the rest of the vegetable down on the plate in front of me. “What?”

“Your mother. Aren’t you curious about why she did what she did?” Gwenthe clasped her hands together and leaned a cheek against her fists.

I felt my mouth drop open. Because, of course, I wanted all the details behind why she made such a decision. Not that I wasn’t grateful. I was alive because of her. But after all, I knew of the Joan of Arc and the little I’d learned about my mom in the last year, my mom wasn’t one to make such a seemingly irrational choice, at least not without an excellent reason. “You know?”

“We do.” Gwenthe batted her thick lashes. “She allowed herself to be swayed by the Devil because we asked her to.”

It was like my brain froze, and my body shut down. I struggled to breathe and found myself kneading my dress into knots. “You… What?”

“In case you didn’t know, things in the realms have been crazy. We nearly had a reset of all magics, and you and the prophecy would’ve been moot, but since that didn’t happen, we needed your mother to give birth to a child. You,” Syne added.

“Yes. We always have multiple fuels in the hypothetical fire of life. It keeps things interesting, doesn’t it?” Gwenthe batted her eyelashes at Syne, who smiled lovingly at her.

My confusion gave way to irritation. “Why would you do such a thing?” How irresponsible.

“The answer is simple. You are a part of us. We are power and creation. Whatever we command is brought into existence. When we formed Faithkeeper for the angels, we had such high hopes for them. She was to be their symbol of unity.” She clucked her tongue. “Turns out, they are just as driven by the most basic of urges as the rest of our creations.” Gwenthe glanced at Syne.

“So true, Beloved, which brings us back to the reason you are here, doesn’t it?” Syne smiled. “You want to know how to bring the prophecy to pass?”

“That’s right,” I said, but I was distracted because there was a fluttering in my belly. My baby was moving. It took every effort not to glance down, but I did rest my hands against my stomach just in case the baby needed comforting.

“Well.” Gwenthe’s smiled knowingly. “Over the years, there have been many possibilities. They were called to bring the prophecy to pass, but you are the only one to meet all of the obligations, including being with child.”

My power flared to life. “My baby has nothing to do with this,” I said, my voice lethal.

“You are totally wrong, Alice. Your baby is the reason you will bring about the prophecy. Finally.” Syne sipped his drink. “You see, for the prophecy to work, three requirements had to be met. “The first was a child born of the Devil and an archangel.” He pointed and continued. “That is you.”

“The second was that child had to live to adulthood and be able to get pregnant. Also you,” Gwenthe said.

“Right,” Syne continued. “The final condition was Faith. She needed to hold the one who wielded her with such adoration that she would reveal all of her secrets.”

Gwenthe smiled. “And Faith was immediately enamored with you, weren't you Faith?" She glanced at her daughter, adoringly.

"It's true," Faith admitted. "Alice is the best of any being I've ever been in contact with. I will serve no other." She glanced at me, and I saw the fire in her eyes.

It rocked me, the sincerity and strength of her words. "Thank you, Faith. I will do all I can to honor your conviction in me."

Syne and Gwenthe clapped their hands. "And that is why the prophecy is finally able to come forth. The three of you are the perfect trio."

I still didn't understand but decided to ask another question. "We are to bring unity to the angel realm?"

Gwenthe rolled her eyes. "Over the years, the prophecy has been whittled down to fit the angels' needs. The prophecy is for more than just the angels, and you three will bring unity to all realms."

That sounded unattainably impossible. Since it was so massive, I decided to ask them to get me out of the third trial. "What about my father? He still intends for me to complete my final trial." If I didn't have to give up the most precious part of myself to save someone I loved, that would be awesome.

"Oh, we know." Gwenthe and Syne gave each other a knowing smile, and my pulse quickened. "You see, Alice, the third trial is what starts the prophecy in motion." While she spoke, she corporeal form turned to mist, and she hovered a moment, waiting.

Syne transformed into mist as well. They swirled around each other, like a dance before moving over to Faith.

Her fork clanged on the table as she turned into my blade once again.

I wasn't finished, Faith said into my mind, disappointed.

Sorry, Faith. And I was sorry, but I was also consumed with dread. My hand went to my belly. I wouldn't give up my daughter. And no one, not the Creators or the Devil, could make me.

In an instant, I was back in the tunnel. Quickly, I went until I reached the mirror. Stepping through, I crossed the room without hesitation and didn't stop until I was back in the mists. After what I just experienced, the indistinguishable gibberish was a welcome relief.

Once again, I was in my uniform, the dress gone. Faith had returned to my wrists and was soundlessly pouting.

I was too.

When Kade found me, he sighed with relief. “I was beginning to worry.” He pulled me into a quick hug. “What did the higher-ups have to say?”

I didn’t respond right away, but walked beside him, pondering until we exited the mist.

“Alice?” he prodded gently.

“I didn’t speak with the Heavenly Harbingers,” I said, bringing out my wings and taking to the air.

“Where were you then?” he asked, once he was flying beside me.

“I spoke with the Creators.”

Kade was confused and beyond shocked, but didn’t voice what he was feeling.

“They told me how to bring about the prophecy,” I continued.

“That’s good, I guess.”

I didn’t know how to tell him about all I was feeling. About Faith, my baby, and me. And about how the prophecy was supposed to come to be. It felt like my heart was being squished and I felt out of control.

Kade let me stew in my thoughts until we reached the roof of the building where his office resided. “What can I do to help?” he finally asked.

“You need to let me return home,” I whispered, staring at my feet.

He stepped back and crossed his arms.

I met his eyes, and hoped he could read some of the conflict residing in my mind. He was disappointed. I figured he must think I was giving up on him and on the angels. “The prophecy will start when I complete the third trial,” I uttered, unable to look at him another moment. He said he wanted to help, but he couldn’t. No one could, except maybe Wrythe. I needed to see him again.

“Very well. I will escort you to the Welcome Station. You can leave right away.”

“Thank you.” My emotions were in my throat but I didn’t try to clear them.

Without another word, Kade took to the air.

He’s sad to see you go, Faith said.

You think?

Oh, yes. I can feel it in the air.

I’ll talk to him.

I caught up with Kade and cleared my throat again. “Thank you for all of your help. I wish you and Mari all the joy you could ever hope for.”

He blinked several times. “Loving you was the best decision I ever made,” he responded.

Okay. Was he having second thoughts about his union? “But, you love Mari more?”

One side of his mouth turned up into a smile. “Yes, Alice.”

He didn’t sound completely sincere, but it wasn’t my place to decipher his strange moods anymore.

We reached the Welcome Station and landed. Tillie let us in before giving us some privacy.

I didn’t have anything more to say. His life was here. “Well, thanks again,” I said, and went toward a door.

He turned the handle. It shimmered a moment, and the door opened. “Goodbye, Alice.”

Faith sniffled.

It's for the best, I said to her.

It's still sad.

If you say so. I was the opposite of sad. With each step through the opening, I was closer to Wrythe. Not even the time in the mist could deter my joy. Any moment, I would get to jump into my fiancé's arms and have him hold me. Any moment—

"It's time, Alice."

OceanofPDF.com

HIS WAS the voice of my father.

I had to cover my mouth so I wouldn't let out an aggravated scream. "Not yet," I sobbed.

"Now," the Devil said. And I was back in his spacious hollow with thousands of menial demons gnashing their teeth and anxious to escape. As though the Devil had trapped them in the walls. The Devil sat on his throne; one leg crossed over the other. His elbows rested on the arms of the oversized and pretentious chair like he had all the time in the world.

The white rabbit was there too, peeking from behind the throne. His nose and whiskers moved rapidly in time with my beating heart. He glanced at his pocket watch. "We're late. We're late. We're going to miss the date."

"Not so, Rabbit," the Devil said. "We're right on time." He clapped his hands together, and my white uniform vanished and was replaced with an inky blue dress, the lace sleeves reaching past my wrists and the collar touching just below my neck. The skirt was long, so I could no longer see my shoes, and the bodice was tight.

My hair no longer rested along my shoulders, so I guessed it was pulled up and probably in a lovely style.

I didn't care. Moaning, I fell to my knees, causing the skirt to bell out around me like I was drowning in a pool of dark water. It felt like it.

I didn't want to do this.

You don't have to, Faith said.

Her words sparked something in me, and my distress turned to fury. Because since I found out I was pregnant, I knew what the Devil was really after. It wasn't me, but my daughter.

He wouldn't have her.

My power thundered to life.

Faith flickered and slithered along my wrists in anticipation.

"Now, then," the Devil said. "It is time to complete the third trial." He smiled, and I wanted to puke.

Instead, I stood, allowing my power to pulsate just under my skin.

"You are required to give up the most precious part of yourself to save someone you love." His smile grew, and he uncrossed his legs and stood. "I bet you've had all sorts of thoughts trickle through your head about what that might be." He took one step down, and that was too close.

I stepped back. I didn't want to play his games. "True," I said, hoping to get him talking so I could come up with some kind of a plan. I need an idea, I hissed to Faith.

I'm thinking, she responded.

He began to walk at a leisurely pace, not toward me, but along the outskirts of the room. "Things like your love for Kade. Your Dark Moth power. Then your angel power. Your wings." He paused. "Can I see them?"

I shook my head, but he clapped his hands, and they appeared.

Dammit!

They spread out to their full potential, and I was pleased to see his eyes get wide. "They are even lovelier than I imagined. Would you give them up?"

I didn't want to. I did like them a lot, but I would if that meant I didn't have to give up the child growing inside me. "Yes," I said.

"Hm-huh. And that's why it isn't the most precious part of yourself." He tucked his hands behind his back and started walking again.

I sent my wings away and turned so I could keep an eye on him.

"I bet you even thought it might be Faith."

It was my turn to be surprised. He knew her name. “I did.”

“And I do want her.” He rubbed his hands together. “I have a feeling if I asked, you would give her to me freely.”

My shoulders slumped, but I forced them back. To save my child.

I understand, Faith said. It’s okay. Of course, you would give me up if it meant saving your baby.

I touched my stomach. Gritted my teeth. There has to be another way.

Together, we’ll find it.

“Alice!” In the blink of an eye, the Devil was directly in front of me. So close, I could feel his breath on my face. “Wouldn’t you?” His voice boomed.

“Yes,” I admitted, but lifted my chin defiantly. I didn’t want to give up Faith or my daughter, and I wouldn’t. Somehow, I would defeat my father.

He nodded and began a trek around the room again. “You think you won’t do it? You think you have the power?”

I know I do, I thought. “Yes,” I said. Did he know that completing the trial would set the prophecy in motion? I doubted he even cared.

You do, Faith verified.

“So, you have options. Kill me and destroy yourself and your child. Or refuse and destroy all Moths.” He went up the steps and sat back down on his throne. He was proud of himself. Arrogant. “But if you agree to give me the child when it is born, then I will allow the Moths to live, and life can continue the way it has for thousands of years. It’s a win-win, really.”

He is the most awful creature, Faith said.

Agreed, I said and closed my eyes. Because there was another flutter in my belly. My baby. How am I supposed to give you up? I can’t. Tears pushed against my eyes.

“What’s it going to be, Alice? Your daughter's life for thousands of Moths or the death of thousands so you can raise your child. Alone."

You wouldn't be alone, Faith chimed in.

I knew that, but Wrythe would be gone. My heart ached.

Help me! I cried in the deepest energy of my soul. It wasn't to Faith so much as just a shout to out the Universe. The Creators. The Heavenly Harbingers. Someone. Anyone.

Almost immediately, an answer came. It was as if the baby's mind as well as mine and Faith's all fused together. Flashes and images sailed across my mind like mini-movies. A dozen of them in a second. And then the same flashes happened again and again. Until I understood what needed to be done.

The plan would require trust, but if it worked?

Faith, did you see that?

Yes. She sounded nervous. I was too.

Are you okay with this plan?

It would be an honor, Alice.

Thank you, Faith. I opened my eyes.

The Devil raised an eyebrow, waiting.

I took a deep breath and a step toward my father. My power pulsed. Then another step and another pulse. Another step and another pulse. It continued like that, up each of the steps to the Devil's throne.

Instead of fear, there was happiness in his expression. Did he know what I intended to do? It was doubtful.

When I was so close, my dress touched his legs, he pushed himself into a standing position, so he had to look down on me. "You can't win, Alice." He flashed a quick smile, so I saw all of his white teeth. "You have power, but it isn't as much as mine. And if you try to kill me, you know you will die too." His hands cupped my face.

The feel of his touch repulsed me, but I stood firm. I needed to be close. I needed to throw him off guard.

“Father,” I whispered and wrapped my arms around him, pressing my face against his chest.

He didn’t immediately respond like he was debating my sincerity, and I thought he might push me away.

There wasn’t much time. Now, Faith.

She changed into a blade, and as I sank it into my father’s back, he returned my hug. Warmth gushed from the wound I created, but I was determined and pushed from his grasp.

The Devil was surprised. “Stabbed in the back. The ultimate betrayal,” he said. “I will make you suffer for this.” He tried to reach around to grab the blade. His fingers reappeared with black blood on them. His brows scrunched together as he reached around once again. Still, he couldn’t get it.

My hands were covered in his blood, and I wiped them on my dress as I retreated. My heart pounded with nervousness. This had to work, but it would take a few minutes for Faith to get completely embedded in him.

“Rabbit,” the Devil yelled. “Retrieve the blade from my back. I cannot seem to reach it.”

The rabbit hopped over as the Devil turned so I could see Faith was gone. Buried. Her power infiltrating and stealthily taking control of him from the inside.

Hope buzzed through my veins, and the baby fluttered at my belly. This had to work for all our sakes. “Please,” I whispered.

“It isn’t there, sire,” the rabbit complained.

The Devil snarled and rushed at me, but he only got two feet before he slammed against an invisible forcefield. At his touch, it flashed gold. “What is this?” He turned and tried to go around it. But again came into contact with the forcefield. Again and again, he tried. He clapped his hands, a move used to kill the Dark Moths as well as Catherine.

This time nothing happened.

“This doesn’t change anything, Alice. If you don’t complete the third trial, you will go insane,” he said, his voice so furious I knew if he ever escaped, he truly would make me suffer by killing everyone I loved.

“I have to give up the most precious part of myself, but never once did you say I had to give up that precious part of myself to you,” I snapped.

The Devil stopped trying to escape his incarceration. “That was assumed,” he jeered.

“You know, assuming just makes you an ass,” I said and smirked. Even as naive as I was when it came to things of the world, I’d heard that saying before.

He got deathly still. “Very well. Then say the words.”

I copied him and crossed my arms and moved, so I was right beside him. “I will give up my daughter when the time comes, not to you or to the demons or your sick games, but to the man, she deems worthy of her.”

The Devil spat, and it smacked against the forcefield and slowly trickled down.

Immediately, I knew the third trial was over. The Devil had no more control over me. There was a flutter in my belly as though my baby were happy with the outcome too.

“You think you’ve won, but you haven’t. Sooner or later, I’ll escape this prison and when I do—”

“You’ll never escape,” I barked, interrupting him. Faith, I called, hoping she would hear me.

But there was no answer. “The Faithkeeper comes from the Creators. No one but them can alter the power holding you.” I pressed my hand against the forcefield. Warmth radiated, but the part of Faith that spoke to me was gone. Only her power remained, keeping the Devil trapped inside. But I would meet Faith's soul again. I knew it. Gripping my fingers together, I went on. "You will remain in this prison eternally. No power. No life. Nothing but emptiness." When I finished speaking I shuddered. I wouldn't wish such an existence upon anyone, except the Devil.

I turned away and headed to the exit.

"Alice?" It was the white rabbit.

My eyes fell on him and I blinked, unsure what he wanted.

"What should I do?" He was flustered and kept glancing at his pocket watch. Then he held it out so I could see it. The minute and hour hands were spinning and spinning like they were out of control.

My heart softened for the creature. "You can work for me," I said and knew that was right.

He did something weird with his mouth, flashing his teeth.

"What are you doing?" I wasn't sure whether to be concerned or angry.

He hopped over to me. "I'm smiling, Alice. Can't you tell?" He dropped his pocket watch, and it hit the ground with a clang and shattered into pieces.

It was more of a grimace than a smile. "We're going to have to work on that." I patted his head. "Now, can you lead me back to Demonland?"

"Yes. Of course." He shooed some of the menial demons out of the way, then paused. "What about them?" He pointed at the screeching demons.

I shrugged. "I guess someone else will have to deal with them."

He opened the door and stepped through.

I went in after him.

"And the game? What about the royal demons?"

"I don't have all of the answers, Rabbit, but whatever comes I'll deal with it."

“You’re in charge, Alice. You are the next in line. The demons will look to you,” the Devil shouted, his hands banging against the invisible prison.

I paused and turned back.

He smiled. “You rule the demons, daughter. It’s all I ever wanted for you.”

A steely calm filtered through me. My father was right. I was heir to all demons and that meant what I said would become law. I returned the Devil’s smile with a grin of my own, knowing in a way I was now the villain—at least to all demons. They weren’t going to like my orders. “I command all royal demons to stop the evil game at once. There will be no more bedding and killing humans or any other creature for that matter. All evil demons are required to remain down here.” I didn’t want those who lived in Demonland to be harmed in any way. They were kind and good. “Once the evil demons have all returned to Underland, they are required to watch over the Devil. Never leave. Don’t even think about it. There is nothing but your mission.” As I spoke, my power filtered from my mouth like shadowy smoke and grew, and it would continue to grow until all demons everywhere received my decree. They would have no choice but to obey.

The Devil began to shriek and say things I didn’t understand.

I ignored him and turned to follow the rabbit.

“Come on, Alice. We aren’t late, but I’m sure Wrythe is eager for your return.” He did the funny thing with his face again. I guess it looked like a smile. Mostly it looked like he was about to sneeze.

I chuckled. “Lead the way.”

OceanofPDF.com

I WAS DREAMING. My daughter was running and flying and running again. Chasing a butterfly and I was chasing her. We were both laughing. The insect landed on her finger and suddenly it was no longer a butterfly with vibrant wings, but a pulsing golden light. “Hello,” came a voice from within. “I’ve missed you both so much.”

“Faith,” my daughter cried. Then she turned to me. “Mommy, when will we see Faith again?”

Sadness filled my chest. I missed my weaponized friend. “Someday,” I said.

When I woke, there were tears on my pillow. Years had passed since she’d been a warrior voice inside my head.

“Are you okay, Alice?” Wrythe’s voice was close and his hand rested on my hip.

The sadness dissipated and was replaced by need for my husband. I inched closer and wrapped a leg over him. “I am now,” I said, and snuggled into his bare chest.

He held me tightly, kissing the top of my head and stroking my back.

I sighed, contentedly. Since imprisoning the Devil, so much had changed.

With all of the evil demons bound to remain in the Underworld, there was no longer any need for the Dark Moths. All Moths were safe. But, Wrythe knew there were many young Moths who didn’t have a good home or life because their mother was killed.

After Wrythe and I were married, our first order of business was to open Demonland to all Moths and not just those with marks. Since they needed to be found we tasked many Dark Moths, including Wendy to track them down and offer them a place at the school. They would be loved and taught and given a place in society when they desired.

Seth never came back, but we knew he was out there. When he found out about the Final Death of his twin brother, he would return with a vengence. When he did, we would be ready. I still had the demon orb and always carried it with me whether I wore my boots or not. That and my blade.

Some Dark Moths no longer wanted to live in Demonland but desired a life above ground. For them, Wrythe opened up the treasuries and gave each an inheritance.

Rabbit became my most trusted advisor. After a year, I put him in charge of the "good" demons. Because of my decree in the demon realm, there were many demons seeking refuge in Demonland as well. Rabbit had a big job, but I'd never seen him happier. He had a new pocket watch and could still be heard to say he was late.

And my half-brother, Jax? He helped me fix Crystal Peak, and came to visit in the human realm all the time.

When Demiangel was born, Wrythe and I took a step back from our responsibilities. We put Wendy in charge of Demonland and left. We needed to introduce our daughter to her grandparents. And once we lived in Salem, Massachusetts for a while, we knew we could never live permanently in Demonland again.

So we returned to Wonderland, Arizona and bought a grand house. Then we asked Styx and Daya and their families if they wanted to live with us. They happily agreed. We have the most beautiful and magical grounds and landscaping in our city because of the pixilettes. And Styx cooks the most incredible dishes. We are always pleasantly surprised by her culinary creations.

And the prophecy? It was as the Creators said. Once I completed the third trial, the prophecy was immediately fulfilled. Wars and contentions around the world and all the realms suddenly ended. Peace was everywhere. Supernaturals and humans were free to roam the human realm as well as every other.

Professor Pops knew it wouldn't last long thought. Because while there was peace, the prophecy didn't rid the world of evil. People and supernaturals still had choices. Sooner or later someone would rise up and once again start a war.

Not only that, but there were those who needed help. Wrythe and I decided to open a private investigations office for the supernatural. The building was finally complete and furniture and décor went in the week before. We hired several Dark Moths as well as other supernaturals to assist us, but I still hadn't found the right person to be the face of our agency.

Wrythe put an ad in the paper and we had our first interview later that day.

But first, I intended to make love to my husband.

I ran my nose along his bare chest.

He rolled on top of me. "My sweet wife," he whispered and kissed me deeply, pressing my mouth open and stroking my face with his thumbs.

I wrapped my legs around his hips.

"Mommy. Daddy." Demi opened the door.

Wrythe growled happily and bit my lower lip.

"Later," I whispered.

"Hello darling," Wrythe said, climbing out of bed.

The man was hot even in his pajama bottoms. Since Demi turned three, we had to change our naked sleeping arrangement to wearing something more appropriate.

Wrythe picked up Demi, kissed her cheek and then tossed her into the air.

Demi giggled infectiously. "Again. Again. Daddy. Again."

I wondered if she liked to fly because I did. At some point she might even get wings. Wrythe certainly loved my wings. My cheeks heated as I thought of all the times I'd spent in his arms—with and without my wings.

"Mommy, why is your face red?" Demi climbed on the bed and planted herself in my lap.

"Oh, just thinking happy thoughts," I said, and glanced at Wrythe.

He gave me a look that had my lower belly dancing.

"Is it because we get to go to your office today?" She stood and jumped on the bed, clapping her hands.

Wrythe and I laughed.

We'd promised Demi she could come with us today.

"Something like that," I admitted.

AFTER DRESSING AND EATING, we drove over to the offices. The three story building was in the heart of Wonderland. Our sign which read, Supernaturally, PI hung across the front.

When he got inside, Demi ran around to each of the rooms, commenting and touching everything. Wrythe followed, happily keeping an eye on her.

I sat at the front desk, waiting for the applicant to arrive.

The bell above the double glass doors tinkled.

"Just one second," I said, and quickly finished up what I was doing on the computer. When I glanced up, I gasped. The woman waiting looked like she could be my sister—except her hair was fiery red and beautiful. But her features and the shape of her face as well as her body type? Very similar. Instantly, I knew her. "Faith," I said and stood, coming around the desk.

"Hi Alice. Ready to kick some ass?" She smiled, and it lit up her whole face.

"You're here for the job?" I remembered the name on the application was Faith, but I didn't think much of it. In the human realm, it was a common name.

“I am.”

“You’re hired,” I said, and rushed into her outstretched arms.

“What’s going on in here?” Wrythe asked.

I introduced him to Faith.

Demi squirmed out of his arms and went over to Faith. She studied her a moment. “I know you,” she said and took Faith’s hand.

“I know you too,” Faith said, and blinked several times.

It only took moments for Demi and Faith to be best of friends.

Wrythe’s arms came around my waist. “Think she’d watch Demi a moment. There’s something I want to show you in my office.”

I stood on my tip-toes and touched his face.

He leaned down so I could whisper in his ear.

“Want to play a game?”

He growled and lifted me into his arms.

I laughed, my eyes meeting his, and knew Wrythe and I would live happily ever after.

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

ESCAPE

WYSTERIA

“You must hurry, Wysteria. She will return at any moment.” Leva appears seemingly out of nowhere, scaring me half to death.

I’d been gazing longingly at the view beyond my window.

High above the ground, inside my towering prison, I could see the green, green grass, the lush treetops, and the sparkling azure water that went on for as far as my eyes could see.

“You startled the hell out of me,” I say, my hand flying to my throat.

“Sorry, not sorry, Wys. Now come on.” My little pixilette best and only friend pats my cheek and flies into the room, hovering above the trap door.

“Alright. Alright.” I adjust my skirt while I move, working to find some courage.

Leva has enough for the both of us, though she’s probably only five inches tall. Sunlight from a hole in the roof envelops Leva’s body, causing her teal wings to shimmer.

“Move like your butt is on fire,” she huffs, putting her hands on her tiny waist. “If you are still here when she returns, I won’t be able to stop her from doing something worse than she already has.”

“Okay. Sheesh.” I slide on my shoes.

She lets out an annoyed sound. “Maybe this time it’ll be forever. No more living in this tower with a window where you can see so much of our land. No more anything.”

I push my extra-long blond hair off my face, going over the plan.

Once I’m out of the tower, I must travel through the thickets and to the beach where a boat will be waiting.

From there, I am to row until I reach the end of the realm.

The whole thing sounds ridiculous.

I can't do this!

At the prospect of going alone, my insides quiver.

"Leva, I can't leave. Mother will be upset." I fan my face with my hand as a nervous sweat breaks out along my hairline.

"Redyrin," Leva corrects. "She isn't your mother. She kidnapped you away from your real mother and father in the human realm. She doesn't love you. She's just using you."

I swallow down my fear. "I know. I know," I say, even though I'm still trying to figure it all out.

I don't remember my parents or the human realm.

I don't remember anything at all before I arrived here. To my mind, never had I ever been outside the walls of my tower.

Not once in eighteen years.

At least not once that I can remember.

According to Leva, my real name is Rapunzel, and I don't belong here.

Part of me is thrilled at the prospect of leaving.

I always dreamed of a life beyond my tower.

But the more significant portion of myself is dizzy with fear.

Can I abandon what I know?

"Leva, come with me. Please. I can't do this by myself. I need you."

Even though she hadn't spoken to me once before yesterday - my eighteenth birthday - she's been my companion and only friend for so long, I don't want to be without her.

"Very well, but you need to pick up the pace." She tugs on my hair, and I follow her over to the leather satchel, where she helps me pack some bread and cheese.

I want a change of clothes, but there isn't any time.

“Keep this safe,” she says, picking up and handing me a clear bottle nearly as big as her.

At the effort, her wings and hair change from teal to tawny, the color of her eyes.

I take it, studying the contents, which look like water, except when it catches the light allowing me to see strange things, almost like stars shimmering within.

“Hurry,” she says, snapping me back to the task at hand.

I tuck the potion into one of my dress pockets and tug the bag over my head so the strap rests on my shoulder.

Leva’s pointy face pinches with worry, and her large eyes that seem almost too big for her face become cloudy with anxiety.

She drops onto the escape hatch in the floor and taps it three times with her fingers. The latch clicks.

“You did it,” I say.

Part of me hadn’t believed she could.

She’d kept her magic a secret from me all these years, too, probably because of Redyrin.

My mind is still reeling at all Leva has shared since Redyrin left last evening to hunt and forage our food.

As I follow the pixilette down the steps, I relive our conversation in my mind.

Even now, I sense the rightness of Leva’s confession.

But the knowledge doesn’t change the fact that I’m so scared my knees tremble with each step.

Am I really going to do this?

Go to another realm, the human one, and find my family.

My heart shouts with joy over the possibility, but my mind recoils.

What if it’s as Moth-Redyrin says?

What if life outside my tower is too much to handle?

My extra-long hair catches on one of the nails sticking out of a wooden step. “Ouch,” I cry, rubbing my head and working to untangle my hair.

My locks have never been cut. According to Redyrin, doing so will be detrimental, but sheesh, it’s annoying.

“Your hair is obnoxious,” Leva says, confirming what I already know.

She flies over and carefully unhooks my hair.

When it’s free, she speaks several words.

I guess it’s a spell.

Without stopping, I hurry after Leva.

Down, down, down all of the circular stairs. The turret is dark and damp, and the steps are covered in moss.

Redyrin did spells all the time.

She would wind some of my hair around her hands and then say words I didn’t understand. All sorts of things would happen. Paintings came to life and talked to Redyrin.

Our tower would be clean in seconds after a few words uttered from Redyrin’s mouth.

Strangest of all, whenever Redyrin began to look tired and her hair began to gray, she would whisper the words that brought youth back to her body.

Many times I asked Redyrin about my hair. She always said I was unique, and she needed me to survive.

At that thought, I shudder.

Would Mo-Redyrin die if I left?

I didn’t like that she took me away from my real parents, and I didn’t like that she kept me locked away in the tower, but she had been good to me in her own way.

I didn’t want her to die.

“Wysteria,” Leva says, frantic. She snaps her fingers, and a spark of magic snaps me out of my thoughts.

I study her, working to keep my eyes from crossing.

Before I can say anything, my hair, which has been dragging along behind me, is suddenly pulled away from my face and secured back into a braid.

“Thank you, Leva,” I say and sigh. One less thing to worry about.

At the bottom of the steps, I pull open the door. Leva flies out, but I don’t follow right away.

“Will Redyrin die without me?” I ask quietly.

Leva opens her mouth to speak, but nothing comes out. Like she changed her mind.

“Probably not,” she finally says.

Then under her breath, she adds, “But it would serve her right.”

I disagree. “No, Leva. I can’t do that to her.” I don’t move, debating whether I should go back up all of the stairs and just settle into my fate.

Leva’s face becomes bright pink, and she clenches her hands at her sides in fists, her body shaking. I thought she might burst.

“Leva?”

She lets out her breath and turns back to the tower, saying some words.

“What did you do?” I ask.

“If she stays in this realm, she won’t die, okay?” Leva says.

“Thank you,” I say, relief washing over me. Even though I don’t understand what the pixilette did, I trust my friend.

“Whatever.” It’s obvious Leva is upset with me, but I can’t help how I feel.

“Humph.” She flies away and disappears into the shadow of the trees.

I rush after her. "Wait."

When I reach the woodland's edge, I glance back, clutching my hands to my heart.

My tower is all I know, and the unknown terrifies and excites me.

Plus, I have a feeling there is still much for Leva to tell.

On the boat ride, I intend to get my questions answered.

"Wysteria!" Leva is irritated. To prove it, her wings and hair shift to deep green, the color of the leaves.

"I'm moving as fast as I can," I say but pick up the pace, tripping over roots and rocks and whatever else is on the ground.

My dress snags on a bush, and I yank it away, causing it to tear.

Leva doesn't notice but speeds along faster and faster until I'm running to keep up.

It isn't too long before we reach the water.

The sandy beach is covered with white sand.

Driftwood and seaweed linger near the water's edge, sending the smell of salt and wet wood into the air.

The water is so clear I can see the sand.

Orange fish dart around, searching for food.

Leva flies over to the boat. "Help me untie the rope," she says.

I walk over and unwrap the thick rope, tossing it into the small wooden boat.

It seems too small for such a vast ocean.

"This will get us to the end of the realm?" I ask.

"Yes, now climb in." Leva crosses her arms, waiting impatiently, her ever-changing hair and wings shifting to the same blue as the water.

"Hurry, please," she commands, her eyes flitting along the landscape behind me, probably searching for Redyrin.

Lifting my dress, I carefully step in.

The boat rocks precariously, and I grab hold of both sides to steady myself.

The wood is smooth with a shine on it.

“This won’t sink, right?”

“Definitely not.” Leva clucks her tongue, frustrated I’m questioning her. “I wouldn’t lead you to a leaky boat, Wys.”

“You’re right,” I say, though I’m still not feeling very confident. Because what if there’s a windstorm? Waves could easily capsize this boat.

“Or should I call you Rapunzel now that you know the truth?” She studies me thoughtfully, tapping a finger against her lips.

“No, please don’t. I prefer Wys, thank you.” I sit and grab hold of the oars. I haven’t been out in the world, but I’ve read about it and know what these are for.

“Very well.” She touches each of the oars, and they begin to row on their own, making my hands unnecessary. “And we’re off.” She gives me a brilliant smile, suddenly much more relaxed.

I put my hands in my lap, watching the pixilette. She is daring and bold, and I want to be more like her.

First, I need answers.

“Tell me why Redyrin stole me away from my parents? What’s the human realm like? When we get there, how will we find my family? Are there towers in the human realm? Why do - ”

“Stop, you’re giving me a headache,” she says, rolling her shoulder back and coming to sit on my hands.

“First things first,” she begins. “The reason Redyrin took you is - ” She trails off at the sounds of a hundred banshee’s screaming.

It’s Redyrin. She found my tower empty.

“Not good,” Leva says and flies up above my head. Then she starts chanting words in rapid succession.

Two things happen at once.

The boat starts moving really fast. So fast, in fact, that the oars pull themselves into the boat.

The other thing is a glittering field falls around Leva, shrouding the boat and me.

OceanofPDF.com

THROUGH THE CURTAIN

WYSTERIA

“Don’t make a sound,” Leva hisses. “The boat is invisible, but if she looks just right or if she hears you, we’re done for.”

“Lev - ” I wonder why she didn’t do this in the first place, but don’t question my friend and rescuer.

“Quiet!”

I clamp a hand over my mouth but spin around in time to see Redyrin burst through the thicket, her eyes searching the beach.

Her pale and lovely face is tainted with fury, and I suck in a breath.

I’ve never seen her so angry.

The boat continues to speed along the water swiftly without making a sound.

In no time, Redyrin is just a dot against the shore.

A few moments later, I can’t make out her dark hair.

It’s another ten minutes before Leva finally relaxes her shoulders and sits on the edge of the boat.

“It’s okay now. We’re far enough away.” As she speaks, she glances back at the way we came and then nods.

“It won’t be long now, but my magic is waning. You may need to row for a few minutes.”

“Sure,” I say as the boat slows. That’s why she didn’t do it right away. She has magic, but it only lasts for so long before she has to recuperate.

I pick up the oars and place them in the water. But before I can begin, something dark appears, like a shadow in the water a ways off.

“What is that?”

Leva is on guard again and jumps into the air, flying near me with her hands out as though she intends to harm whatever is swimming toward us.

The shadow turns into a woman’s head and shoulders covered in long, dark hair. “Hello,” she says when she reaches us.

“A mermaid,” Leva says. “Watch yourself. They can be vain creatures. If she feels you’re too beautiful, she may try to drown you.”

“Wonderful,” I say without sarcasm.

Then I wave at the mer-fish-lady. “Hi, I’m Wysteria.”

The mermaid rests her hands on the side of the boat.

So close, I can see her scales and her skin. She is partially like me, but the rest is that of an emerald green fish.

“I’m Ellora. What are you doing out here?” she asks, her voice soft like the lapping of the ocean against the shore.

“Don’t tell her,” Leva snaps.

But I don’t listen.

“We’re trying to get to the end of our world.” I feel myself smile so big my cheeks hurt.

Other than Leva and Redyrin, she is the only other talking creature I’ve come across.

“Mind if I swim along with you?” she asks. Her jeweled eyes turn cloudy with sadness.

“Not at all,” I say, thinking her voice makes the most beautiful sounds I’ve ever heard.

I push the oars into the water and begin to row.

Ellora swims alongside, flipping her glorious tail, causing it to glisten in the sunlight.

Leva is ignoring me, sitting with her face turned in the opposite direction, but I can’t help myself.

“Are there a lot of mermaids in this water?”

Ellora gives me a strange look. “Of course, there are. I am one of the thousands. My people live under the sea.”

Her face crunches with curiosity. “What’s it like to have legs and to be able to stick your toes in the sand?”

I think that’s a strange question. “I don’t know,” I admit.

She lifts herself out of the water and peers inside the boat. “But you do have feet inside those what-do-you-call-them? Shackles?”

“Shoes,” Leva huffs. “They are called shoes, Miss Mer-Person, and yes, she does have feet, but she’s been a prisoner in a tower. Now, if you don’t mind, we need to hurry.”

Leva lifts her arms like she intends to speed up the boat again.

“Wait, Leva. Don’t be rude,” I say, not wanting to be done talking with the mermaid.

“Are you going to the human realm?” she asks, her lovely features blooming with interest.

“Yes,” I admit, surprised she knows that’s where we are heading. “Have you ever been?”

She shakes her head, and her eyes fill with tears.

“No, but I long to. I want to be human like you and walk in the sand and dance and know what it means to fall in love with a human man.”

That seems oddly specific, but who am I to judge? I have dreams too. “Then I’ll come back for you. I promise.”

“You mean it?” Ellora asks.

She tilts her head to one side as though she’s trying to decipher me.

“I never break a promise,” I add.

An enormous and beautiful smile breaks out across her face. She waves. “Then I’ll be waiting. Good luck, Wysteria.”

Ellora dives, her long and beautiful tail appearing before she vanishes beneath the water's depths.

"Goodbye, Ellora," I say, staring into the deep water until I can no longer see her.

Leva turns and flies in front of my face. "Did you enjoy that?" she asks, sticking out her tongue. "Because we're nearly there."

I want to ask her more about mermaids, but before I can, I notice we are nearly at the edge of the realm.

It's like a black curtain has risen out of the ground and covers what lays beyond.

The winds pick up, and the clouds darken.

"What's happening?" I dig the oars deeper into the water and strain to hold the boat in place, but it continues to chuck forward.

"We've reached the edge," Leva shouts over the wind.

Her wings flap so quickly I can barely see them, and her hair turns white as snow while her body flushes scarlet from exertion.

"What are you doing?"

She doesn't answer, but when the boat starts speeding along the frothy water toward the blackness, she doesn't have to.

I know she's summoned all of her power.

I pull in the oars again and clench my hands together, wishing to help in some way.

The closer we get to the blackness, the more scared I get.

There's a drop-off in the water, like a waterfall. Steam seems to be rising.

"Is that where we are going?"

I don't want to. It looks like we're going to fall into Hell.

I hold my breath in anticipation.

"Get the bottle ready," Leva shouts.

I fumble with my dress until I find my pocket and retrieve the bottle. “Now what?”

“Don’t throw it until I say so,” Leva says, her arms still spread out to her sides like she’s dragging the boat.

“Okay.” I grip the bottle tight, nervous about what’s going to happen.

A few seconds later, Leva drops her arms and lands on the seat beside me.

She looks exhausted.

“Leva?” I question. Fear racks through my veins.

“Should I throw the bottle?” I ask.

“No,” she says softly, obviously waiting for something.

We are so close. Any second we will go over.

With each ticking second, my fear rises.

And I decide I’ve changed my mind.

I don’t want to leave Redyrin.

“Now,” Leva shouts, her voice hoarse from all her effort.

For the briefest moment, my mind goes blank.

But then I remember what I am supposed to do and stand, throwing the bottle at the inky curtain.

The darkness swallows it, and I wait, letting out my breath in a huff.

The curtain starts to shake and open.

There is something on the other side.

“Is that the human realm?” I ask, picking up Leva.

“Yes,” Leva says and closes her eyes.

I cup my hands together around her to keep her safe from the spray of water as the boat is sucked through the curtain.

On the other side is a vast yellow country with mountains in the distance.

Before I can study our surroundings close up, the boat strikes the ground with a thud, and I'm sent flying backward, landing on the hard ground.

My breath is knocked out, and I suck in several times to catch it, rolling over and onto my knees, still holding Leva in my hands.

"What the hell?"

Directly in front of me are a set of dusty cowboy boots.

I glance up and into the face of a handsome man with dark hair pushed under a tan cowboy hat.

"Where did you come from?" He glances beyond me and at the boat, pulling his hat more firmly on his head.

He's wearing jeans and a plaid shirt tucked in at the waist. In his other hand is a rope. There's a sound, and a calf takes off running away from us.

I try to stand, not liking to be at a disadvantage.

Before I can, a bunch of images - memories - of a time before I was taken rushes back all at once.

Pictures of my real parents.

Their smiling faces.

The love they have for me.

My friends. One in particular.

A boy about my age with dreamy eyes and a sweet smile.

Emotion after emotion racks through my body, and my knees buckle at the weight of all I'm reliving.

It feels like I'll die, especially when I see my parents lying on the floor in pools of blood.

Dead.

Then my heart seems to crack from my chest. My parents are gone, and I am truly alone.

Except, from the dark recesses, I see a man with golden hair the same color as mine.

He is hanging back, a shadow within all of the images.

As one after the other flicks through my mind, I notice the man and somehow know he is my brother.

I have a brother.

Unless he's dead now too.

A moan escapes my lips, and I feel my body being lifted.

OceanofPDF.com

MY DEEPEST DESIRE

CHRISTOPHER

There are only so many ways I can try to forget what I lost, who I betrayed, and the gulf of loneliness in my heart.

Women work the best - for a while.

The scent of their skin and the taste of their blood - that is the drug I love the most.

Sweet, erotic, and filled with hope and longing.

But the problem is, after a while, the glorious haze of them dissipates, and loneliness consumes me once more.

That is my state of being when I hear the first whisperings of the fountain of youth, and I know they are speaking about my sister.

Even before Wysteria was taken, I knew what she was.

Our mom and her dad knew as well, but they refused to listen to my pleadings to take precautions and keep my sister safe.

Now they are gone.

The room I lay in is extensive.

Windows line two of the four walls, letting in the dark and starry night. The windows are open, allowing the scents of exotic spices to fill the air.

Light curtains sway lazily in the breeze.

A harem of women rests on one side of the room, and I lay on a four-poster bed on the other.

The women believe I'm sleeping, finally satiated, so their conversation starts softly.

"Vampires will take over the world someday," one says quietly.

"Why would you say that? They aren't all like that one."

I assume she means me and smile internally.

“True, I guess.”

“I think the world will be overrun by elves before vampires,” another says, her voice quiet but intense.

“You might be right,” the first says. “Have you heard of the one they call Rapunzel?”

Another woman answers. “She vanished many years ago, but it’s believed she’s returned and is the living, breathing fountain of youth.”

“Don’t let Charming hear that, or he’ll eat her.”

I flinch at the way she says my name - like I’m a monster, but then I decide she isn’t wrong.

Still, I won’t eat my sister. Not that they know that, though.

The women continue to talk as I think of Wysteria.

She is my mother’s daughter.

I learned of her by keeping tabs on my mom over the years.

She remarried a kind man who also possessed one of the most exotic of the seven magics, unicorn blood.

He and my mom together were a remarkable combination.

He was a healing balm for my mother’s soul, and when they were together, an immediate change came over her.

She was a good mother to Wysteria, and I was only slightly jealous of the bond they shared.

And then, my mom and her new husband were killed because of Wysteria.

I trembled with anger at learning the news.

By the time I returned to Gothel Springs, Wysteria was gone. Snatched without a trace.

No one seems to know who took her or killed our mom and her dad, but I have my suspicions.

After years of searching for Wysteria, I came to the conclusion she must be in another realm. So, to hear someone else talking about my sister being back?

That is news, indeed.

And no surprise, she is already in danger.

“ - the Sisters have spoken. This girl is the fountain of youth,” one of them says.

“I wouldn’t want to be her. She probably already has an enormous bounty on her head. Dozens are probably hunting her if someone hasn’t gotten to her already.”

“Isn’t it true her parents were hunters?”

“Yes, they worked under the vampire queen, Snow White, as part of a supernatural task force. But they were brutally murdered.”

All of this, I know.

It had been great seeing my mother do something good with her life. Working for the good of the humans and the supernatural community had brought her and me some peace.

“What exactly did the Sisters say?” one of the women asks.

My ears perk.

The Sisters they speak of are a trio of witches.

Some believe they are as old as the dragon, Abernathy, while others say they are directly connected to the Unknowns.

I don’t care one way or another, but I am interested in what they said about my sister.

“Yes, tell us what they said.”

“I cannot. It’s forbidden. Go to their temple and find out for yourselves.”

“Speak,” an older woman barks, and I flinch at the bite in her voice.

She might make a good vampire one day, not that I would change her anytime soon.

I'm still in trouble with Snow White for changing the half-elf and half-human kid, Austin, in Gothel Springs last year.

The whole scenario surrounding the boy was somewhat regrettable.

A crazy mishmash of coincidences, but since changing him, I'd grown to like the kid, probably because he reminds me a lot of myself.

Thankfully, the vampire queen has a soft spot for me, especially since her daughter, Jasmine, and the girl's beloved are somewhere in the realms, searching for Troy's mother.

"Fine. I'll tell, but if anyone asks, you didn't hear it from me," the woman says, and I cut away from my thoughts to listen.

The women giggle and readjust themselves.

"It goes like this: The one who was taken shall be returned. Powerful supernaturals will seek her, all desiring the power she holds. For she possesses the greatest of all the gifts, the fountain of youth - "

"Why do supernaturals care about the fountain of youth? Aren't they all pretty much immortal?"

"That is true, but imagine the influence a supernatural could have over humanity with the power to grant them eternal life and without the need to become supernatural. Not only that, but think what this girl's power could give an already eternal supernatural."

Her voice shudders as she speaks. "They would become more powerful than any others." She sounds terrified, and I don't blame her.

To rule over humans is considered by many the greatest accomplishment.

At one point, even I had such a desire.

And this woman is saying my sister is the key?

For the briefest moment, I allow old needs to resurface.

Though it was years ago, there was a time when I craved power so badly I betrayed Snow White and everything I believed in for it.

Thankfully, Snow forgave me.

But, I worry about what seeing my sister again will do to me.

Should I seek her out?

I want to protect her, but there's a genuine possibility I could slip back into my old ways again.

“Shall I continue?” the woman asks.

“Go on then.”

“Knowing she possesses the greatest of all gifts, the fountain of youth, she will be hunted and condemned to a life of misery unless she accepts her fate and becomes the hunter, slaying those who seek to claim her.”

The room is silent, except for their rapidly beating hearts.

I hold my breath, reciting the revelation over in my mind, committing it to memory.

“The poor dear. I feel sorry for her,” one finally says.

An angry fire builds in my chest.

No one should feel sorry for my sister.

I will protect her and help her, no matter the cost to myself.

It’s the least I can do since I failed to protect her parents - my mother.

With that determination in my heart, I wait until the last woman is asleep and rise.

It saddens me to leave them, their supple bodies and warm blood freely offered, but I have a purpose once again, and my need for blood is satiated.

Yes, Sharra, the old vampire queen, had lied to me a long time ago.

She told me she loved me, and I believed her.

Mostly, I wanted what she offered, the power she promised.

And then she stripped it away like I was nothing.

Like a gnat, she swatted me aside.

After that devastation, I was banished, and for a time, sought revenge.

When the original vampire, Jasmine, got older, my needs changed, and I believed myself to be her true love.

Regret fills my heart at those memories.

That had been a dark time in my life.

Now Jasmine is a friend, and her mother tolerates me.

But one thing is certain.

I refuse to allow myself to be swayed by power.

Again, my needs have shifted.

This time it isn't about me. It's about my sister.

Okay, there might be a small piece of my soul that is hopeful. That maybe one day, I can have the same thing Snow and Jasmine have.

I want true love.

In silence, I sneak out of the room. Using my vampire speed, I dash through the streets, like a shadow, until I reach the edge of the sea. As I go, I can't help thinking about my deepest desire.

It's embarrassing, but it's the truth, and I've denied it too long.

Even as I stare out into the dark water and watch the waves amble onto the beach, a feeling enters my soul.

My time is coming.

My beloved is out there somewhere, and I will find her.

I take in a deep breath, enjoying the briny scent, allowing it to fill my lungs.

And I feel calm.

It's time I return to Gothel Springs and tell my sister the truth about herself.

OceanofPDF.com

BREATH OF FAMILIARITY

AUSTIN

Two Months Later

Gothel Springs college cafeteria is lame.

The food isn't much better.

But, the beautiful young woman who scared the crap out of me on that hot summer day while I worked the calves, the same one I took to the hospital, is always on my mind.

A breath of familiarity.

Whether it's the pertness of her nose or the way her lips are shaped, I'm not sure.

Her hair hung so long I thought she wore a wig, and she had on an old-fashioned dress like she came from another time.

Or, more likely, another realm.

The scent of her blood lingers in my mind, as well - a hint of sweetness combined with the copper. I'm guessing it's magic, but it might be something else.

Not that it matters.

When I lifted her and carried her to my Jeep, it took everything in me not to drink her dry. It would've been so easy.

In Wyoming, there were plenty of wide-open spaces and very few people.

My job also left me alone with the cows and the horses for much of the day.

No one was around, and no one would miss her.

But each time I convinced myself to suck her blood, something held me back - a damned feeling.

Like the girl was so much more than just a body full of liquid refreshment.

So I resisted.

I didn't want to leave her at the hospital, but they wouldn't let me stay since I wasn't family.

But she's always on my mind.

I even dream about her blood - the way it would taste and feel going down.

Those thoughts make my mouth water, and my fangs press against the inside of my mouth. I feel confident her blood would sustain me like no other blood did.

"Austin, snap out of it," my cousin Evan says, punching me in the arm.

I pretend it hurts, so he and the others at the table don't get suspicious.

No one knows my truth.

That I basically died, and a vampire named Christopher brought me back to life a year ago.

Well, changed me into a vampire.

Not that supernaturals are a big deal.

They aren't.

In fact, since the Darkness disappeared and the vampire queen, a woman named Snow White, started working with the world's governments, new laws have been implemented, and supernaturals are even allowed to attend human colleges if they want.

What is the big deal?

That Christopher changed me.

That I started out as a human with elven blood, but he made me into a vampire.

There are strict laws against that.

Accordingly, he should've been banished from the human realm, and I should've been executed.

But like I said. No one knows.

Except maybe the vampire queen.

Christopher commented the last time I saw him, one that leads me to believe she knows.

But he also told me not to worry about it. So I'm not.

"Eff off." I glare at Evan and push around the food on my plate.

"Are you okay, Austin?" She's one of two girls sitting at the table with Evan and me. Her girlfriend calls her Baby.

The newbie freshman who asks the question and her look-a-like friend batt their eyelashes flirtatiously.

I appreciate all of the attention.

Even before I became a vampire, I was a good-looking guy.

Now, though, I'm irresistible.

I smile but not too big. My fangs are more prominent than they used to be, and I don't want to scare them. "Fine, thanks for asking."

"So, are you in?" the other girl, Beth, asks.

I've never met these girls before today, but they walked into the cafeteria like they knew I was here and asked me to be the third body in their threesome.

"I'm thinking about it," I say. Part of me wonders if these girls are supernatural. They don't have to wear a sign or announce what they are, so they could very well be.

If I had to guess, I'd say they are witches.

Evan, who is sitting next to me at the table, reaches over and slaps me upside the head. "Don't be an ass, Austin."

I grind my teeth to keep from punching him.

The one who introduced herself as Baby slides a hand under my t-shirt and says, "You, me, and Beth. It'll be fun."

I set down my fork. Lean back in the cafeteria chair.

The room is buzzing with the excitement of new freshmen, and the stench of coffee and garlic bread stifles the air.

“If he isn’t interested, I can help the two of you out,” Evan says, smacking my knee with his.

I’ve known Evan my whole life.

He’s an asshole. Likes his own space.

We live in side-by-side apartments instead of with each other or at home. Which is cool by me, especially at times like these.

Fresh meat.

The whole reason we decided to eat on campus.

Evan and I are juniors.

Baby pouts. “Thanks, but I want Austin.” Her fingers run along the waist of my jeans.

Her blood smells good enough.

Nothing like that girl I took to the hospital, but I am hungry, and if we’re together, I can compel them both to let me drink from them.

Beth chimes in, “Baby is mine, but she likes guys and girls. We picked you together. You’re our number one choice.” She smiles, her eyes on Baby.

Baby’s eyes and hands are all over me.

I get the feeling Beth doesn’t want to be a part of this, but she’s doing it for Baby.

“You chose him because you haven’t feasted your eyes on this.” Evan raises his shirt and touches himself.

A group of girls, each carrying a tray of food, walk by. They squeal their approval in unison for Evan’s nakedness.

I chuckle. Now he’ll be worse than unbearable.

The fact is Evan and I look alike - same dark hair, same square jaw.

It’s probably because our fathers were brothers.

Twins.

Once, when Dad was drunk, he revealed that he and my uncle were banished from the elven realm and that he could’ve been king.

I never brought up what he said to his face, but the drunken comment explained a lot about him and my uncle.

Beth releases a heavy breath, bringing me out of my thoughts.

Baby laughs. “You’re cute, Evan, but I - we,” she quickly glances at Beth, “have decided on Austin.”

Evan leans back in his orange chair and snorts. “Whatever.”

I can’t help but laugh.

Evan’s an idiot, and he thinks way too highly of himself.

Obviously, he gets that from my uncle too.

After my dad died, Evan was the one who filled in the blanks.

Our dads were second and third in line.

The king didn’t trust our fathers and had them banished to the human realm. I t was that or death, so, of course, they chose to live here.

Baby and Beth get up from the table.

They didn’t have any food. “Later tonight? We’ll catch up with you at the Sigma Nu party?” Baby winks.

I can’t help but wonder why she calls herself Baby.

She is nothing like one.

“We on?” Beth asks. I might be wrong, but I get the feeling she hopes I’ll say no.

I clear my throat. “Who am I to deny two pretty girls?” I shrug unapologetically.

“Cool,” Beth adds.

Baby squeals and claps her hands.

Beth puts her hand on Baby's waist, and they walk out of the cafeteria.

It's then I notice they're wearing matching outfits: Short skirts, socks that go to the middle of their thighs, and black shirts.

Evan whistles, following the girls with his eyes.

"Holy shit, bro. You're so lucky."

I'm a vampire. They never stood a chance, I think, but just smile.

He slaps me upside the head again. "By the way, have you seen Pudgy Wudgy?"

My bright mood immediately turns somber.

"Wysteria," I correct, and I suddenly know why the girl I took to the hospital looked familiar.

Her first name is Rapunzel, but no one ever calls her that.

She always went by her middle name.

He snorts. "Whatever. She's registered. A brand spanking new UBS freshman."

I drop my hands to my thighs as dozens of questions run through my mind.

The girl I saved was my childhood friend. Wysteria. She vanished after her parents were killed years ago.

Dad said she was probably dead too.

Turns out she isn't.

"How do you know?" I ask carefully.

"It was on the news. Damn, don't you pay attention? Her aunt and uncle recognized her and took her in." He shook his head. "The girl is fine. No longer pudgy, that's for sure."

When we were younger, Evan and some other kids called Wysteria "Pudgy Wudgy." It annoyed the hell out of me then, and it still does.

"I mean it. Don't call her that."

"Fine. It looks like she's going to be taking English with Ms.

Spears. How you gonna handle it?" He's smirking, and I want to punch him.

I'm not sure how to react. "Great. That's great," I growl between gritted teeth.

Because it is great.

Growing up, she was my best friend.

When she vanished, I sort of fell off the deep end, and that's when Evan and I became close. But now she's back, and I'm desperate to talk to her.

"I've got to go." Without waiting for a response, I exit the cafeteria and run to my Jeep.

OceanofPDF.com

LIKE A DRUG

AUSTIN

I drive around for a while because I have no idea where Wysteria is or if she'll even want to see me.

Either way, I'll see her in English the following Monday.

So I take a deep breath, glad I told those girls I'd spend time with them tonight after the party.

I need the distraction and their blood.

Flipping on my music, I drive back to my apartment.

Inside I walk to the piano.

It's thirty minutes of endless playing before I'm able to calm down.

I've decided to play it cool.

Hell, we were kids when she left.

She was eleven, and I was thirteen.

I'm a man now - twenty, which means she's eighteen. And beyond beautiful. I groan and continue to play until someone knocks on my door.

"Open up, Austin. It's me."

I'm surprised and stand, smacking the piano keys with one hand.

Christopher has been gone for months. He changed me. Taught me how to handle my vampirism and then left.

"Chris." I open the door.

"Hey, we need to talk." He's all business.

"About Wysteria?" I ask, letting him in.

Before he left, our last conversation revealed Wysteria to be his half-sister even though she didn't know.

It was a big deal then, and it still is now.

The vampire usually doesn't share things about himself.

"She's back," he says, sitting on my couch and leaning back.

Christopher was born human in the nineteen seventies, but he looks my age.

It's weird, especially since that's how it's going to be for me.

Because I have elven blood, I would've lived longer anyway.

Now though, it's a whole new ball game.

"I know," I say and sit on the chair across the room.

"She appeared out of thin air and fainted right in front of me. Freaked me the hell out. I'm the one who took her to the hospital."

I debated whether to ask where he'd been the last several months but resisted.

In the time before he left, he hadn't talked a lot about himself.

"So what's the deal? Where was she all those years?" I ask, deciding to focus on her.

"In another realm, apparently. A pixilette she calls Leva spent all of the last seven years working to put together a spell to rescue Wysteria from a woman she believed was her mother. A woman named Redyrin. I took Leva to Snow White. She said she would make sure Redyrin's realm is sealed off for good from this one, but we have no idea whether Redyrin already came through or not. I suggested Snow keep Wysteria safe in Sharra, especially when I told her what Wysteria is. Snow agreed, but Wysteria refuses to go. She says she's been imprisoned long enough, and she wants to live her life." Christopher lets out a frustrated breath and runs a hand through his hair.

The vampire looks exhausted.

And thirsty.

I wonder when is the last time he fed.

I'd guess it's been a while.

But it isn't my place to question him.

"What is Wysteria?" I ask, hoping he'll tell me, so I'll have a better idea about why her blood smells so delicious to me.

He eyes me curiously. "Ever heard of the fountain of youth?" He rubs his eyes like he hasn't slept in years.

I snort. "Sure, but it's fake, right?"

He shakes his head wryly. "It was bogus until my sister was born. She is the fountain of youth, and if everyone doesn't know about her already, they will soon, which means she is in serious danger."

My vampire heart races. "But you told her that, right?"

"Of course I did," he snaps. "She doesn't care. Not even her best friend can convince her to go into hiding."

"So, what do we do?" Anxiety washes through me.

I've cared for Wys since we were kids.

Knowing she's here brings back old feelings.

But I've changed a lot since she left.

I'm a vampire now.

Will that matter to her?

Christopher's face softens. "Sorry, man. Listen, I've asked a friend to help, and she put a spell on Wysteria, like a protective barrier around her, so someone can't find her through magical means. But that doesn't change the fact anyone can walk into school, night or day, see her and take her." He stood, his apprehension getting the best of him.

"How did she get in? To college, I mean." Not that I'm complaining, but she never attended high school - at least not in this realm.

She has no ACTs or SATs or any sort of transcript that would allow the college to accept her.

"You know I can be quite convincing when I want to be," Chris said, looking pained. “The dean of admissions and I had a lovely dinner, and I encouraged her to admit Wysteria.”

I know he’s talking about compulsion. Using it is against the law in the human realm, but obviously, Christopher doesn’t care.

It isn’t like there’s a way to track it either.

I try never to use it, but for vampires, that’s easier said than done.

“I’ve signed up to attend school here too. And there are others I’ve enlisted to help as well, but you and Wysteria used to be friends, so she’ll trust you.”

I nod. Christopher’s nervousness is rubbing off on me. “Yeah, we were best friends until she vanished.”

“Use that. Do whatever it takes to stay close to her.” He went to the door. “I’m counting on you.”

I’m confused about exactly what he’s suggesting.

“Like you want me to date her?” I ask, hoping I don’t sound foolish, but I need him to clarify.

She’s magnificent, but her blood is like a drug to me.

If I date her, I might kiss her, and that might lead to more.

I think about telling Christopher about the significance of my need for her blood but change my mind.

Because he might decide I don’t deserve to live any longer if he knows I’m a danger to her, and I’m too selfish to let that happen.

Christopher growls. “No one will ever be good enough for my sister. But according to her aunt and uncle, you were the first person she asked about in the hospital. There’s a relationship between the two of you. So, yes. Date her. Whatever it takes to keep her close.”

He pinched the bridge of his nose. “Don’t do anything that will piss me off, though. She’s still my sister. Got it.”

As a teen, I liked her. Hell, I believed I loved her. But that was a long time ago. “I’ll do all I can to protect her,” I say.

“She’s taking English with the teacher I’m a TA for. I’ll see her then, if not before."

"Good. And I'll be around too. She's a music major." He smiles. "Still loves the piano and plays beautifully. I guess her captor allowed her to play."

His eyes flash red when he says, captor. "You're on scholarship for music, too, right?"

It surprises me, he knows, but it shouldn't. The vampire seems to know everything. "Yep."

"Another opportunity for the two of you to spend time together." He exits my apartment in a flash and rushes down the steps. Then uses his vampire speed to disappear.

I lock my door and return to the piano.

But I can't play.

All I can do is think about Wysteria.

OceanofPDF.com

SHE'S HALF ANGEL

WYSTERIA

“Are you ready to parrr-tayy?” Sage hollers at a random group of girls crossing the soccer field next to us as she conjures a spell of light and shoots it into the air like a firework.

In the darkness, the magic is beautiful, but I still flinch.

My roommate is so aggressive.

The half a dozen freshman Sage yelled at speed up, seemingly desperate to be as far away as possible.

I can’t blame them.

I want to abandon half our duo, but we’re on our way to our first college party.

Sage is so different from me, I wonder if we’ll work out.

It’s like the people handling the roommate selection process wanted to mess with my head.

I can almost hear two evil senior girls cackling. “Ohh, she likes to read, she’s into classical music, and she is good at puzzles? Haha.”

They high-five each other and pull an application from a pile. “Let’s give her this one. Half witch and half chayot. No one wants this one either.”

Bam! I get Sage. Apparently, she was born in a land called Polonias, but her mom and dad moved to Sharra and taught at the Seven Magics Academy.

She also mentioned more than once that she can’t stand her parents, which hurts deeply, even though I refuse to let her see that. I’d do anything to have my parents back.

Plus, it’s cool she’s half chayot. They are special angels whose sole purpose is to help humans. I guess he used to be their leader once.

The only music Sage listens to isn't even music. It's screaming.

Posters of bands are plastered all over her side of our dorm room.

Plus, she plays their songs over, and over, and over.

If that isn't bad enough, she doesn't own a single book - at least, she didn't unpack any.

Worst of all, she has no idea what Sudoku is.

Not that I did either, until two months ago.

But thanks to my aunt and uncle, I love working the numbers into their proper row and box.

I owe my aunt and uncle a lot and am beyond grateful to them for reluctantly supporting my need to go to college.

I need this.

Normalcy.

Parties.

Leva isn't happy about my coming here either, especially when I asked her not to go with me.

I think she went to the land of Sharra and is living there, but I don't know.

After she told me I was an ungrateful friend, she went away.

That was a month ago.

It makes me sad to be without her, and I miss her beyond words.

At the same time, she didn't agree with my decision to attend Gothel Springs college, and it's better if I don't have to hear about it every five minutes.

I haven't told Sage that I have magic too, probably because it's embarrassing.

I mean, how do I bring up the fact that my dad had royal unicorn magic and my mom was the illegitimate child of an elf - not that I've met any of my magical family.

In a lot of ways, stories about them are like the fictional books I read while I was in prison.

“It’s funny,” Sage says, bringing me out of my thoughts. “I scare them,” she points at the scurrying girls and continues, “but they’re heading into the lion’s den.”

She shakes her head. “Are you scared, Wysteria?”

“A little,” I admit.

Not that I’ll get hurt physically.

I’ve never had so much as a scratch.

But I am worried about what will happen when I see Austin again.

Plus, I’ll never admit it, but this whole place makes me nervous.

I mean, it’s college, and I’ve been here for two days.

It still boggles my mind that I’ve gone from living in a tower with only Redyrin and Leva as companions to attending a college with over twelve thousand students.

Unsupervised.

Unfettered.

Free as a bird.

Yeah, it’s scary as hell.

More terrifying than I thought it would be. But scary is better than imprisoned. Plus, I get to play the piano.

Playing the piano kept me sane in the tower.

Here in the human realm, it’s the only thing that brings me peace.

As I walk the field with the rest of the girls from my dorm, I still find it hard to believe I’m not the pre-teen girl with the scared eyes trying her best to survive.

Or the young adult in her tower doing her best to be happy.

Sage’s features turn serious as she studies me. “It’s okay to be scared. That means you’re growing.”

I’m shocked. Her words are profound. “Well, don’t be surprised if I wake one morning as a giant troll.”

She smirks, tucking some hair behind her ear.

“My roommate is a comedian. You go.” She pats my shoulder awkwardly.

I don’t think she knows I’m the girl who vanished seven years ago, but she might and is just doing a good job pretending that didn’t happen.

I am too. “I have my moments,” I say, eyeing her, hoping I haven’t crossed a line.

Sage looks intimidating.

Shaggy long blond hair reaches her waist, but the top is spiked. Gobs of black eyeliner circle her blue eyes.

A slinky black dress and black motorcycle boots complete her outfit.

Her vibe doesn’t say, “Hey, I’m sweet.” It’s more, “Look at me wrong, and I’ll kick your ass.”

I wonder if the girls crossing Asher Field with us are as nervous about being at college like I am.

Sage doesn’t seem to be.

Millions of stars sparkle overhead, and I can’t help but get lost in them.

Darkness covers the wilderness the College sits on, complimented by the occasional streetlight.

Sage and I are staying in Irvine Hall, the tallest dorm on campus.

At first, that freaked me out.

Up in a tower again.

But I accepted it because I’m not alone.

Our dorm is across the street from the cafeteria.

The smell of overcooked food swirls in the air, as does a feeling of exhilaration.

“We don’t have to go, you know. I’ve got - ” I begin, but Sage interrupts.

“Don’t even try it, Wysteria Hart. We’re going to this party, and I demand you have fun.”

“It’s Wys,” I say, correcting her for probably the twentieth time. It’s not that I hate my name. In fact, I love it because it was my mom’s middle name. It’s actually also mine.

My parents named me Rapunzel Wysteria Hart. Rapunzel is so fifteenth century.

Wysteria is nice, but it also reminds me of my mom.

Her smell, the way she would always cut shapes into my sandwiches and tuck me into bed every night, even when I was too old for it.

“Why do you care if I have fun?” I ask.

Sage looks like I slapped her but recovers quickly.

It’s a fair question. Two days ago, she didn’t know me.

“I’ll call you Wys as long as you do two couch shots at this party. Deal?” She smacks me on my arm.

I rub the spot, worried. I have no idea what couch shots are, but after a moment, I agree. “I guess.” I try to smile even as a vision of my mom training me in the art of wielding a stake comes to mind.

If only Sage knew the kind of girl, I was supposed to be.

Certainly not a cowering simpleton.

I roll my shoulders back, determined to channel the type of woman my parents were grooming me to become - an agent for the supernatural task force like they were.

My brother even gave me a stake to protect myself, not that I’ll need it. But still. I could’ve brought it to defend Sage.

I didn’t because I’m embarrassed.

I mean it isn’t like it goes with anything, except maybe my mother’s coat.

I'm not ready to wear that yet.

On top of that, weapons are prohibited on campus.

Sage gives me a quick once over. "And next time we go out, you have to let me pick your clothes and do your hair and makeup. You look like you don't care what the boys think. Those jeans. Really? They're like two sizes too big."

I blush, thankful she can't see my embarrassment in the dark.

Casually I glance at my clothes: slightly baggy jeans hanging off my bony hips, tan ballet flats, and a pink t-shirt.

"What do you mean? This outfit - works."

It isn't stylish like hers, but it isn't bad. I like my jeans. They are comfortable and not a dress.

She huffs. "Did you even brush your hair?"

I'm not one for confrontation, but Sage is getting on my nerves. "Yes, I brushed my hair," I say, discreetly running a hand along the ends. It's super long, definitely longer than anyone else's.

Leva had been doing it for me while she was with me. Now she's gone, I've just been leaving it down.

My aunt suggested I cut it. I didn't tell her I already tried and it didn't work.

"Rude much?" I say, but pull it all to one side. It hangs down past my knees.

Her face falls. "I'm sorry. My therapist says I need to work on thinking about what I say before I say it."

"It's fine," I lie, and shrug, working to separate my hair into three thick strands so I can braid it.

We walk in silence until we are across the field and standing directly in front of the frat house.

People are all over the lawn, on the expansive wrap-around porch, and hanging out the second and third story windows.

Everyone appears to be having fun.

I want that too.

“We good?” Sage asks as we walk down the sidewalk to the front of the house.

“Sure.” No sense holding a grudge.

The party-smile returns to her face. “Cool! Let’s rock,” she shouts, raising a fisted hand in the air.

Several kids at the frat house yell their agreement.

If outside is crazy, inside the party is wild, filled with young, sweaty bodies gyrating to music so loud it’s rattling the windows.

Everyone has large plastic cups filled with a red liquid.

People are laughing in groups while couples are making out.

My cheeks feel hot, and my eyes water.

It’s like I’ve entered another world.

This place is like nothing I’ve ever known.

It’s harsh, sordid, and raucous.

The noise, the brilliant colors - it all makes my head spin and my heart racket against my chest.

It’s obvious how naïve I really am.

I had no idea people did stuff like this.

Living in my pampered prison.

Up until a couple months ago, my only social life was meals with Redyrin.

Now, the atmosphere around me is electric and everything I never imagined.

“Come on, let’s go nuts and do something stupid,” Sage says excitedly.

I follow her, trying hard not to run into anyone, but it’s complicated.

Sage moves ahead of me, her lithe body sliding around people like they aren’t even there.

In the living room is a ratty green couch.

Around it is a lot of commotion. Students cheering.

Bewildered, I stop to watch.

A guy kneels on either side of the sofa. Two girls sit down.

The guys tilt the couch back, and two more guys pour liquid in the girls' mouths.

On either side, students are chanting, "Go. Go. Go."

A couple of seconds later, the guys tilt the couch back up. The girls squeal, looking flushed, their eyes glassy.

Giggling, they wobble as they stand and stumble away.

Two more girls take their places, and the guys repeat the process.

If that's what Sage means about couch shots, then she can call me Wysteria for as long as she wants.

It's what Redyrin called me for years.

I turn away, looking for my roommate, and she's in my face, two cups of the red liquid in her hands.

"Here you go, Wysteria."

I take the cup from her and sniff. Orange, lemon, and lime chunks are floating on top.

The liquid smells like gasoline mixed with citrus. "What is it?"

OceanofPDF.com

I WANT MORE

WYSTERIA

"It's called Jungle Juice." She tips the cup and chugs down the whole thing, takes out a piece of fruit, and bites the meat off the rind.

"Drink up, it'll take the edge off, I promise."

I bring the glass to my lips and flinch, the smell burning my nose, and I debate whether I'm ready to experience what's inside.

Before I make a decision, someone bumps into me, and I get some in my mouth. I swallow without thinking as the rest spills down my chin and gets on my shirt and in my hair.

"Welcome to the best part of college," Sage says, touching her cup to mine with a plastic clink.

I gasp as the drink scorches my throat, and I pull the cup from my mouth, unsure about what to say.

My mind is reeling as a magical fire slowly blooms in my belly.

It could be that I didn't eat dinner tonight, and my stomach is empty, except for the fruity liquid.

But I also think maybe I've been waiting my whole life for this.

And suddenly I want more.

There's still some in the cup, and I chug the rest.

But I'm also sticky and in desperate need of some water so I can clean myself up.

"Where can I wash this off?"

Sage snickers, brushing a piece of fruit off my chest. "I'm sure there's a bathroom around here somewhere."

"I'm gonna go find it," I say, and a gurgle of laughter escapes my throat.

Sage winks. “I need a refill. Want one?”

“Why not.” My fingers cover my mouth. I’m shocked.

Where did that voice come from?

I sound so full of eagerness. Happiness even. “I’ll meet you back here when I’m done.” I point at the red juice staining my shirt.

My top is ruined, but I don’t care.

The fire’s been stoked, warm, and lovely.

I’m relaxed, more than I ever thought possible, and I want to explore.

“‘Kay, see ya in a few.” Sage takes my cup and disappears into the crowd.

I’m stumbling a little, leaning into people. Smiling a lot. Apologizing more.

Someone hands me a drink. It’s frothy and sparkling glitter hovers above it like it’s been laced with some kind of enchantment.

I sniff it, and the bubbles tickle my nose. “Thanks.” I gulp it down in three swallows without thinking about the consequences.

This liquid isn’t red and fruity, but I don’t care.

My throat, my stomach, each and every one of my veins is fueled with this luxurious mellowness.

My head feels heavy and light at once.

It’s freeing.

I forget for a moment what I’m doing.

What was so important that I left Sage and the fruity drinks?

“What’s on her shirt?” A girl asks, pointing at me.

“I think she puked,” someone answers.

I look down and remember the red stain. Like my heart is bleeding even though that’s impossible. “Someone spilled on me,” I say, laughing.

“Do you know where there’s a bathroom?” I’m bold, unencumbered, and ready to make friends with the world.

A giant weight has lifted.

So, my parents died.

So, I'm the fountain of youth, and everyone is after me.

So I spent the last seven years in a tower with my memories gone.

This is why I wanted to come here.

To live a little.

Experience all college has to offer.

"That way," the girl says, rolling her eyes.

I don't even care. "Thanks." I wave and move on until I find a bathroom.

When I jiggle the handle, it's locked.

A girl pushes my shoulder. "Hey, there's a line." She's got wings, and they flutter angrily as she points at a group of kids leaning against the wall.

It seems to go on forever.

"Whoops." I'm not deterred and decide to see if there's a kitchen. There should be. This is a house of sorts.

I spot an entry with swinging western doors and push my way in.

It's the kitchen, all right.

There's an island with pots hanging above it.

To the left is a microwave, a stove, and cupboards.

Straight ahead is the sink, but it's occupied.

There is a girl situated on the edge. A guy is standing in front of her, their hands roaming as they kiss each other. She wraps her legs around his hips and laughs, then sinks her teeth into his shoulder.

I'm about to leave when her eyes flash open and lock on mine.

She smiles before closing them again, losing herself in the moment.

My face heats and blisters at their abandon.

“Sorry,” I say, but either they don’t hear me, or they don’t care, and I’m not waiting around to find out.

A delicious ache spreads low in my belly.

Seeing the way they were so into each other, lost in the moment.

I can’t help but wonder what that must be like except for the part about getting my blood sucked.

I doubt it would even be possible for a vampire to pierce my skin, but even if one could, I don’t want to find out.

At the end of the hall is a set of stairs, and I climb, still thinking about the pair, my body singing with a hunger for something I’ve never experienced before.

At the top of the stairs is a long hallway, several closed doors on each side. I’m thinking maybe I should forget about cleaning my shirt and go find Sage.

Get more jungle juice and try a couch shot after all.

But as I’m debating, I’m walking, and open a door.

The room is full of blue smoke and a strange smell.

Two guys sit on the lower bed of a set of bunks, holding a python that shifts into what sort of looks like a dragon and then shifts back.

I blink several times, thinking what I saw must’ve been a trick of the light.

Or magic.

The snake looks at me, its tongue tasting the air.

It must be ten feet long. Its slithery body is trying to coil around one of the guys’ thighs.

A couple of girls are in chairs across from them. They’re laughing until they notice me.

The guy whose thigh isn’t being strangled stands. “Come on in. We won’t bite unless you want us too,” he says and laughs, indicating a place next to him on the bed as he smiles, showing off a dimple.

“That’s okay.” I close the door and head back down the stairs.

My sticky shirt is going to remain sticky - at least until I get back to my own dorm room.

This house is strange in an exhilarating way.

Every step, every turn is filled with odd and thrilling horrors.

I carefully make my way back to the living room and search for Sage.

She’s talking to a couple of guys.

They laugh.

A coy smirk flashes across her face, and she places a hand on each guy’s chest.

“Sage! Sage!” I wave, but the party is too loud.

Moving past people, I push my way toward her.

Another set of girls is being couch tipped.

It’s like a weird ritual, and I can’t help but stare.

Which is terrible because that means I’m not watching where I’m going, and I walk right into someone. “Oof. Sorry,” I say and look up.

“Hey,” he says, his voice low. “Watch it.” He smells like fresh laundry and aftershave.

I’m about to utter another apology, but the words freeze on my lips.

His eyes are brilliant blue. Twin glaciers. Bright. Cold. “It can’t be.”

I step back, falling into someone else.

My heart is pounding against my ribs, dying to break free, to run like wild horses.

It’s in my throat.

He’s here. Austin.

Right now. In front of me. He’s here.

Austin catches hold of my arms and pulls me against his chest. I debate whether I should twist out of his grasp, ignore the way his warm fingers ignite memories. Instead, I cling to him.

“Austin,” I whisper, smiling against his shirt. Smiling like I haven’t smiled in seven years.

“Wysteria,” he responds, his eyes flashing recognition.

“Hi.” I can’t help but focus on his sexy lips and his white teeth. They look -

“Hi yourself.” He pulls me against him, wrapping his arms around me.

“I missed you.” I’m uninhibited and desperate to make up for lost time.

Because I’ve missed him.

Even at eleven years old, I knew he was the only man for me.

Now, with his body pressed against mine, I’m sure I don’t ever want to let him go.

My hands travel up his muscled arms to his neck.

Before I know what I’m doing, I’m on my tiptoes.

“Kiss me, Austin.”

His smile vanishes, and he lowers his head, pressing his soft lips to mine.

They move slowly, massaging my mouth into submission.

A need burns low in my belly, and when he pushes my mouth open and slides his tongue inside, I gasp at the electricity shooting through me.

After I don’t know how long, he gently lifts his head, a bemused smirk on his face.

I feel mine get hot, and I glance around.

Two girls, both with perfectly styled chestnut hair and beautiful faces, look at me like I’ve slaughtered a lamb.

He follows my gaze, and his smile gets bigger.

“If you’d care to join us, I’m sure we can make room.”

I have no idea what he’s asking, and I peek at him.

Surprised.

What is he suggesting?

“Austin?” I want to talk to him. Alone. Just the two of us.

I take in all of him at once.

He’s probably two feet taller than the last time I saw him.

Dark, wavy hair, a little on the longer side, hangs in his eyes.

He keeps flipping it. His body is lean but muscular like he plays a sport.

He always liked basketball and hockey when we were growing up.

His skin is tanned, but then, it always was. His eyes are the same, as is the way his lips form a smile.

Austin, I think, my heart smashing itself to pieces.

The girls are talking fast. Some of the words are vile, and I realize what I’ve done. I knew Austin a long time ago, but a lot can change in seven years.

Obviously, he is different.

Maybe even like his father.

I gasp as a memory of finding my dead parents enters my mind.

And suddenly it doesn’t matter that he’s the boy I’ve loved since forever.

I shove him or at least try to.

He’s much stronger than he was at thirteen.

“Get away from me,” I say and take off.

Tears fill my eyes as I search for Sage.

She isn’t in the same place. I can’t find her anywhere, and I need to leave.

The smoky air, the stench of sweat and perfume, and the loud music - it twirls my stomach in knots, and I no longer feel free and unencumbered, but woozy and sick.

I need fresh air.

“Wait,” Austin calls after me.

I don’t turn back.

I can’t.

OceanofPDF.com

SNEAKING OUT

WYSTERIA

As I head back to my dorm, my mind is reeling with horrible thoughts of the night my parents died.

I can't believe when my memories returned two months ago, they didn't include the part where Austin's dad killed my parents.

Damn.

It's like what transpired before is happening all over again.

I'm walking home from a friend's after sneaking out.

My parents had been distracted when I left, playing cards with another couple, so it was easy. Now though, it's after two in the morning, and the lights are still on.

They must know I'm gone, and I brace myself for the consequences.

But as I come around the corner and into my backyard, I see two men exiting my house by the back door.

The light from the porch is on.

I hide in the butterfly bushes, worried it might be my dad talking to one of his fellow hunters.

My parents work on a special task force headed up by Adam Henry and overseen by Snow White, the vampire queen.

Sometimes they are terrifying.

Quickly, I realize neither of them is my dad.

One of the men is holding a stake and a purple bag that looks like my mom's. He tucks the stake into his back pocket and pulls out something shiny.

It flashes in the porch light.

A hunter's gun.

My heart races with worry. Why does he have a gun?

Was something supernatural trying to hurt my parents?

"Hurry up," the other man whispers. "We need to find her."

"She went to a neighbor's. I'll get her," the man without the gun says.

The man with the gun turns, his gaze searching my back yard, and I see it's Austin Morrison's dad.

He's also the Chief of police for Gothel Springs and is a liaison with the supernatural task force.

Hatred pinches his face, and I'm confused.

Afraid too.

So, so scared.

I never liked Austin's dad.

He always gave me the creeps.

A fierce tightening clenches my chest, and I don't know why.

As soon as the men leave, I run inside the house.

"Mom! Dad!" I whisper-shout, in case the men come back.

I pass through the kitchen and into the family room.

When I enter, my feet slide to a stop.

Mom is on the floor, blood pooling under her.

Dad is lying beside her, his arm draped over her waist.

They look like they're sleeping, except for all the blood.

So much blood.

My mind shuts down.

I'm not prepared for the scene in front of me.

It can't be right.

Nothing's happened. Nothing happened, I tell myself over and over.

It's a mistake.

I'm dreaming.

I will not cry, I think, even as tears leak from my eyes.

And I wish there was some way I could make Chief Morrison pay.

My parents trained me to be a hunter like them and have been since I could walk.

They never worried about me getting injured because, for some reason, I can't get hurt.

At least not physically.

Mentally though, I feel myself crack and break and shatter into so many pieces, I doubt I'll ever be whole again.

Before I can decide what to do, a light swirls a few feet away from me.

I try to run, but a woman with inky black hair steps through the light and directly in front of me.

It's Redyrin.

She casts a spell and my eyes close, making everything go dark.

WITH THE MEMORY STILL LINGERING, I work to focus on the here and now as I cross the field. But I'm in a haze.

My parents. I never got the chance to mourn them.

Not really.

Redyrin stole me from the human realm, and she also stole my memories.

It feels as though my body is being torn in half.

My hands shake, and tears spill onto my cheeks.

When I reach the main entrance to my building, I wipe my eyes, hoping no one notices I've been crying.

Inside the elevator, there are three super-tall guys and me.

Two of them are Black, and one is white. They each hold a basketball. One spins his on his pointer finger.

They're laughing and joking.

I do my best to ignore them.

One of them says something, touching me on the arm, but I don't turn, and they leave me be.

When the elevator doors slide open, I exit, run down the hall, and once I'm in my room, I rip off my stained shirt, tossing the smelly thing into the hamper.

My bra is stained too, and I unhook it, throwing it into the hamper as well.

Pulling off my jeans, I kick them near the hamper and put on an oversized t-shirt.

It was my dad's.

Across the front are the words: Supernatural Task Force.

I fall onto my bed, my breathing erratic, and pull my comforter around me for warmth and protection.

I miss Leva and wish she was here with me now.

But I have no way of getting a hold of her.

Besides that, I was rude.

She saved me, and I repaid her by telling her I didn't want her around.

Stupid. Stupid.

I lay in bed for a long time, thinking about Leva and my life.

Christopher told me Austin's parents are dead too.

I don't have to fear his father.

At the time I felt relief, because of what his dad did, but now?

I'm just sad.

For me.

For Austin.

Losing one's parents isn't something I would wish on anyone.

When the sun comes up, I finally sleep.

A DOOR SLAMS, and I blink, sitting up.

“Leva - ” I rub the sleep from my eyes and work to focus.

It isn’t Leva but Sage.

She’s still wearing her slinky black dress, but her makeup is smeared, and she has bed-head.

“Why did you leave the party?” She sits gingerly on the edge of her bed, grabbing a fluffy cream cat with one eye missing.

Sage clutches it against her stomach.

I don’t answer. Warning bells are flashing behind my eyes. Something’s wrong.

“Sage,” I finally say, and move toward her. “Are you - okay?”

She waves me away. “Yeah. Why wouldn’t I be?”

I notice her lashes are wet. She sniffs and lies down on her side.

“I asked for it.” She rolls over, facing the wall.

I stand there like an idiot, unsure whether to comfort her or leave her alone.

My time in the tower hasn’t prepared me for real interpersonal relationships.

I’m not sure what she thinks she asked for, but I’m terrified for her.

“Can I get you something? A coffee?” I sound like an effing jerk, and the worry in my gut builds.

She turns over gently. I see she’s crying. “Why do you care if I’m okay?”

She’s flinging my words from last night back at me.

My first instinct is to agree and walk out.

But she’s hugging the cat so tightly I feel sorry for it.

I sigh and sit on her bed.

“I think it’s because you and I are meant to be friends. And friends care about each other. If you’re sad or hurt, I want to help.” My voice is calmer than I feel.

Two enormous tears drop on her pillow. “You mean it? You don’t think I'm an outrageous bitch?"

I force back a snort at her choice of words.

She's the epitome of outrageous with her crazy outfits, hair, and makeup, and music.

Even her black boots scream outrageous, but she's definitely not a bitch.

"I think your outrageousness is going to be one of my favorite things about you." My hands are tucked into the end of my shirt, but I feel like I need to comfort her somehow.

I grab a tissue from the table between our beds and hand it to her.

She takes it and wipes her eyes, then blows.

When she's finished, she chucks the wadded tissue toward the trash. It lands at the end of her bed. She reeks of alcohol and cigarettes.

"You wanna talk about it?" I ask.

She takes a deep breath, yanks off her boots, and lies back down. "First, I need to sleep." She pulls her covers up and rolls over.

"'Kay," I say softly, wishing I knew what else to do.

But I'm tired, and it feels like I have grass growing on my teeth and tongue.

I need a shower, some toothpaste, and some toast.

Maybe when I am back from the cafeteria, she'll be ready to share what happened.

I know it isn't good, and anger burns in my veins. I want to protect her and hurt those who hurt her. "I'll try to keep it down."

When I return to our room, she's gone.

I don't speak to her again until Monday.

SHE CAME in again after three in the morning and is now sound asleep.

It's the first day of classes.

I feel like I should remind her about going.

But she seems so broken.

I can't bring myself to speak the words.

I quietly pick up my towel and bathroom necessities, pulling on a pair of fluffy pink slippers. I grab my keycard and open the door.

As I'm leaving, Sage whispers, "Gave a great first day of classes, Wys."

She didn't call me Wysteria. Things are worse than I thought. "Thanks."

There's only one other person in the bathroom.

She gives me a curt smile, takes her stuff, and walks out.

Not that I mind.

The tile floor is wet. Most of the shower stalls are dripping water.

I step inside one, close the bright white curtain, and set my stuff on the ledge.

I keep on my shower shoes and hang my shirt on a hook before turning on the water.

Icy liquid sprays my body. I quickly adjust the faucet, wondering who would be crazy enough to shower in cold water.

Within seconds the water warms, and my body relaxes.

I wet my hair and wash it.

As I'm rinsing, I close my eyes.

And Austin is there, in my mind, as though he's been waiting.

His smile, the one he gave me at the party Friday night, lights his face. He kisses me, and my knees turn to jelly.

I don't have to look to know my hair is glowing indigo. That happens when I'm overcome with emotion.

I can feel it.

After showering, I scrub my teeth. Pay close attention to my tongue. Spit. Then dress in oversized jeans, ballet flats, and a black tee.

My hair is still wet, and I wind it around until it's in a bun on top of my head before swiping gloss over my lips.

There are dark circles under my eyes, so I apply concealer and brush on a little mascara.

My caramel eyes are flecked with green.

Sometimes, depending on my mood, they get darker.

Today, they're almost almond in color.

I know why.

Austin.

It isn't only his kiss that has my body vibrating.

It's more than that.

I want to know him again.

I want to be his friend and more.

But I shouldn't. His father was evil.

What if Austin is evil too?

It occurs to me that Austin might be here because of his father.

Revenge or something.

Is Austin out to get me?

On the news yesterday, they broadcaster spoke about the dead body found on Saturday night.

She was a student at the school.

We'd received more than one email telling us to be careful and watch out for each other.

Evan Morrison found the body - that's what everyone's saying.

It doesn't surprise me he's involved.

I never liked Evan.

Since he's Austin's cousin, I can't help thinking about everything my parents said about him as a kid.

But supposedly, the murderer is a vampire.

All vampire students are required to be interviewed by the campus police and the Supernatural Task Force.

Even though I'm sad someone died, I'm grateful for the extra security nearby.

Giving myself one last look in the mirror, I pull a couple tendrils of hair from my bun and let them dangle on either side of my face.

Put away my makeup.

There's no sense dwelling on what can't be changed.

I need to focus on the now, on what I can do to rectify my situation.

I told my aunt and uncle and my brother, Christopher, I wanted to attend college to have a regular life.

It's getting clearer and clearer that might not be possible.

And maybe I don't want regular anyway.

With a new attitude, I sneak back into my room, careful to be quiet.

From off the desk, I grab my backpack and sheet music and leave like the slayer my parents trained me to be, without making a sound.

OceanofPDF.com

GREEN EYED MONSTER

WYSTERIA

Outside, the early morning sun beats down as though it's desperately trying to elevate my mood.

There's a slight chill in the air, but I like it.

In my tower in whatever realm I'd been held captive, the temperature always hovered around the same balmy seven-two degrees.

I hurry into the cafeteria, punch my code into the console, and grab a bagel, cream cheese, and a glass of orange juice.

The smell of coffee and bacon fills the room.

I debate grabbing some but the line is long, and I don't have time.

I want an hour to practice the piano before my first class.

There's a tiny round table in the corner near one of several large windows, and I sit.

After I smear cream cheese on half a bagel, I take a bite. The air is crackling with anticipation.

It's my first day of college classes.

I feel grown-up and free.

The cafeteria is packed.

People are in groups, the same as what I imagine high school was like.

One long table is filled with kids, all chatting and laughing loudly.

I can't help watching and wondering what they're talking about.

I take another bite of bagel and put my earbuds in.

Scrolling through my music, I find the piece I'm going to practice - Nocturne No. 2 in E - and press play.

It starts out slow, whimsical.

As I listen, Austin walks in.

His hair is wet and rumpled.

Like he got out of the shower and shook it dry.

He's wearing a tight blue t-shirt that accentuates every muscle in his arms, chest, and abs. His jeans sit low on his hips.

The girls from the party the other night is beside him.

I guess they've been spending a lot of time together.

And that makes me crazy jealous.

My heart starts to race, and my cheeks get hot. Envious beyond belief, I look away, taking another nibble of my bagel, but I can't keep my traitorous eyes from tracking him.

The music playing in my ears speeds up, and so does my breathing.

Austin glances over, his eyes locking on mine, and a smile spreads across his lips.

I know that look.

Even if he is a man now, I'd recognize it anywhere, which makes me more excited than I thought possible.

All the times we hung out together - in his room, in my room, listening to music, talking about what we wanted in life, rushing through homework so we could ride bikes through the field or play video games - it bubbles up and runs over.

I've missed him terribly.

He whispers something to the girls and then strolls over, leaving them to fend for themselves.

My heart leaps.

Butterflies escape and spread their wings, fluttering lightly in my stomach.

What will he say?

I can't help but notice the way people in the cafeteria watch his movements.

He's like one end of a magnet. Everyone is drawn to him.

Including me.

I sit up straight and pull out an earbud.

"Hi," I say when he's close. My heart skips several beats.

"Hey." He places both hands on the edge of a chair and leans forward.

I can smell his aftershave and a hint of vanilla - his shampoo?

"About the other night," he begins.

I blink several times, open my mouth, close it, and try not to look like a trout. My bagel drops onto the napkin.

"Yeah?" I ask, desperate for him to continue.

One of the girl's he left behind saunters up next to him. She's wearing a white button shirt, tied to expose her belly button, a navy mini skirt, over-the-knee navy socks, and black, super high shoes.

She drapes her arm through Austin's and glares at me before smiling brightly at Austin. "Let's eat," she coos.

Trying not to gag, I stand.

His father was the enemy, which I guess makes him the enemy.

"It doesn't matter. I thought you were someone else," I lie.

He knows it too but doesn't call me on it.

I pick up my music and my bag and move to leave. "You're welcome to sit here, if you want," I say, edging around them.

His smile falters, but only for a second. "Wysteria, don't go," he says, his eyes pleading.

"I - have to," I say.

"Fine." He makes a point to pull the girl in close and kiss her.

She squeals and giggles.

Yeah, he's a jerk.

I want to scratch his eyes out.

But my heart doesn't care, and an image of Austin kissing me enters my mind.

THE FINE ARTS BUILDING is on the other side of campus. When I'm only halfway there, I'm sweating. I'm so out of shape. It doesn't matter that I have supernatural blood in my veins.

I'm still pooped and wishing I had a bike or a car.

I stop and lean over, heaving in gulps of air.

"If you were a vampire, this wouldn't be an issue."

I smile and stand, turning toward the sound of my half-brother's voice.

"Hey, Chris. I wondered when I would see you."

He told me he would be on campus as a student, and that's exactly what he looks like. Jeans. Boots. And a button-up.

His dirty blond hair is rumpled, and his hazel eyes study me with worry and wonder.

"Hey yourself, sis," he returns and tucks a hand in one of his front pockets. His other hand is holding a backpack in place on his shoulder.

A couple of months ago, when he told me he was my brother, I hadn't been surprised. Because I had the memory of him always in the background of my life before I was taken.

He'd been my on again off again protector.

Then when he told me I was the fountain of youth and that there would be all sorts of supernaturals coming after me, I hadn't balked.

He wanted to take me to the land of Sharra where he said I would be protected.

But all I heard was that I would have to leave and be put in another prison. I wasn't having that, and I told him so.

He and my aunt and uncle pleaded with me to listen, but I refused to leave.

I refuse to cow to bullies for another second.

If they want me, they can come, but I want to live my life freely until then.

My family reluctantly agreed and let me come to college, but there are contingencies. One of which was that Christopher enrolled in school here too.

As we study each other, I have a feeling even though I haven't seen him, he's been close by.

"Where are you off to?" I ask, moving again.

He steps in pace with me. "Wherever you are," he says. "You've heard about the death on campus, I presume?"

"I have," I say, gripping my bag. I glance over at him. "What's the matter?" It's obvious he has a problem.

"I figured once you saw Austin again, the two of you would be spending a lot of time together."

Was Chris trying to pawn me off on Austin? "Yeah, well, you thought wrong," I say, adjusting my bag.

"Are you mad at him?"

"I am," I say but know it's more than that. I'm jealous. "He's been spending a lot of time with these other girls." I shrug. "I'm not sure what to think of him."

"Give it time," he says, but I see him grind his teeth. He's angry about something.

I debate whether to ask him what, but think better of it. The piano is calling me. "Maybe," is all I say, and pull open the door.

"Wysteria?" he calls.

"Yeah?" I face him.

"You're carrying that thing I gave you, right?" He looks around to make sure no one is listening even though vampires and werewolves, and other supernaturals have hyper-sensitive hearing.

So, really, it doesn't matter that no one is nearby.

But whatever.

"No," I say calmly. I just don't have the heart to put the stake in my backpack.

It's weird.

His face contorts in frustration, and he walks over, unzipping my backpack.

I can't see what he's doing but assume I now have a stupid stake inside.

"Keep it with you at all times," he says, zipping it back up and coming around so I can see his face.

"It's for more than stabbing vampires. It's also been spelled so it can harm just about any supernatural."

"Super," I say and turn away.

He calls my name again.

I sigh. "What?"

"There are those who want to take you and use you. Don't forget that."

"I won't," I say and step inside, letting the door close behind me.

I expect him to follow, but he doesn't, and I'm grateful.

Heaving a deep breath, I head down the steps.

The practice rooms are in the basement.

As I go, my shoes skim down the stairs, the padding echoing off the walls.

I push open one of the heavy double doors and am rewarded with one of my favorite sounds.

Music.

It's loud and soft.

Heavy and light.

Staccato and legato.

Classical and jazz.

Rock and roll.

All sorts of amazing sounds as stringed instruments play, people sing, and piano keys plunk, each to their own rhythms.

It's the sounds of every emotion that ever existed, all bottled up into individual rooms.

I make my way down the hall slowly.

Music is my church.

My home.

The best kind of magic.

I stop in front of one of the practice rooms and peer inside. It's empty except for a piano and a bench. My breathing slows, my heart settles.

I step inside, allowing the door to close behind me with a click.

My body unwinds. I sit on the bench and place my hands on the keys.

Another breath.

I play the first chord. Nothing exists but the sound.

I scoot the bench, shift my butt, and play another.

Then run through my scales. I start at middle C.

The left-hand plays down, and the right plays up in synchrony.

Without skipping a beat, I move to the next set of scales.

My breathing keeps time with my hands.

I rock back and forth slightly, allowing my body to feel the beat, my fingers to warm up and modify to the keys of an unfamiliar piano.

By the time I'm halfway through, my world shifts, and I feel better.

For the first time in days, there is no Sage and her sad face, her words shredding the room with hurt.

No Austin and his beautiful smile.

There is only this room, and these keys and my fingers forming notes. There is only crescendo and decrescendo, allegro and adagio.

After a while, I move on to the piece I want to play for Professor Jenkins.

I'll see him tomorrow for my private lesson. It's an honor to be taught by the Professor and not one of his graduate students, so I want to be prepared.

But as I begin, Austin's face fills my mind.

It blocks out my peace.

Instead of notes, I see his dark, messy hair and his glorious, blue eyes.

Slamming my hands against the keys, I stand.

The clock on my phone says my first class starts in ten minutes. I grab my stuff and dash out the door. I don't want to be late.

OceanofPDF.com

I WANT HIM

WYSTERIA

After being in the basement, the light of the outdoors burns my eyes, and I squint. My first class is close, but I need to hurry.

The day I arrived, I took the map they gave me and did a walkthrough of my classes. Then we had orientation, and a couple hundred bored freshmen followed perky guides around for three hours.

Luckily, most of my classes are near each other.

Dorms and the cafeteria are located to the south. The sororities are north of the dorms. Asher Field and a hangout known as The Mall sit behind the sororities.

Then there are the fraternities.

Behind them is a graveyard.

To the west of Asher Field is the library and colleges in specific fields - Education, Agriculture, Anthropology, Engineering, Physical Sciences, and the Arts and Sciences.

To the east are the Law Building, the Fine Arts Building, the Mikesell Building, the Arena-Auditorium, an athletic center, the stadium, the College of Molecular Biology and Animal Sciences, and finally, the Center for the Visual Arts.

Buses can take me where I need to go, and I'll probably use them when it gets colder, but for now, walking is better.

English is a required course.

I enter the Mikesell Building along with several other students.

A tall guy wearing the University of Gothel sweats pushes past me. He has a basketball in one hand. With the other, he touches my shoulder, his palm swallowing it up.

“Sorry about that.” His face is friendly.

“That’s okay.”

He takes off in the direction I’m heading and walks into an auditorium-style classroom.

The room is packed, filled with fresh-faced new students, the same as me.

I find a seat near the back and slide in.

The doors close with a resounding clack.

A tanned woman with bleached blond hair twirled into a perfect bun walks to the podium. She’s wearing irresponsible heels and a navy suit.

There’s a pencil protruding from the flawless bun.

She looks tiny from way back here.

“After today - ” The door closest to me springs open, interrupting her. The Professor stops and waits.

Sage walks in. She looks rough in a pair of navy sweats, but at least her face is missing the smeared black liner she’s been sporting since Friday night, and her hair is pulled back in a ponytail. I wave her over when she catches my gaze.

Once Sage is seated, the woman continues, “These doors will be locked at exactly nine o’clock beginning next class. If you’re even one second late, you will not be allowed to take part in my lecture, and you will be docked participation points.” She gives a pointed look in our direction.

I feel myself sink down in my chair.

“Sheesh. College is serious,” Sage pouts.

I give her a sideways look and see she’s smiling. None of the hurt from the weekend is apparent in her features.

“My name is Professor Susan Spears. You may call me Professor or Ms. Spears. I will not answer to anything else, including Susan, Ma’am, or Teacher.” She makes a face. Moves to grab a thick stack of papers and hands them to someone sitting in the front row.

He stands, and my heart freezes.

Holy crap, it's Austin! My pusle rachets against my chest.

"What's wrong?"

I turn to Sage. "Nothing," I say, but the word catches in my throat. Austin is in my class. I shake my head and return my attention to Austin. He's sending papers down each row and he's already on the third one.

"Mr. Morrison is my TA," Ms. Spears continues. "He's passing out your syllabus. Don't lose it. It's the only one you'll receive, so protect it with your lives." Her eyes linger on Austin and a pang of irrational jealousy dances along my skin.

"Dramatic much?" someone says.

Professor Spears breaks a pencil - snaps it in half with her fingers. "This isn't high school. You don't have to be here. If I sound dramatic, that's because this class is necessary to graduate." Then she points to someone and says, "Get out. You're no longer welcome."

I hear a gasp. A girl rises and steps around other student's feet. "Witch," she stage whispers. There are a few giggles.

But I think she might be right. No one can look that perfect unless she's using a spell. I should know. Redyrin used my power to keep herself looking young and beautiful.

"Keep it up, and I'll have you thrown out of school," Ms. Spears continues.

The girl clamps her lips shut and walks to the door, throwing it open. The door closes behind her, and the room is silent. Even Austin has paused in passing out the papers. It's so quiet. All I hear is breathing and the pounding of my heart.

"Please continue, Austin," Ms. Spears says.

He does as she asks and moves to the next row. Three away from mine. I'm tempted to get up and leave, but unlike some, I want to be here. I want a degree.

Sage scribbles something on a piece of paper and shoves it toward me.

What's your problem? Witchy Spears? Or hottie TA?

I don't respond.

"Anyone else feel the need to leave my class?" Ms. Spears asks.

No one says anything, which isn't surprising.

"Excellent. Once you have your syllabus, review it. You'll notice there's a paper due each week - " She continues speaking, but I've stopped listening.

My body is trained on Austin. Two away.

Sage adds more question marks to the paper.

I swallow. My first thought is to deny, deny, deny. What's the point, though?

She sets her pencil on top of the paper.

I scribble back, I'll tell you later.

A grimace crosses her face, and she sniffles. I'm worried that she's crying and look over. She gives me a huge smile. I notice her eyes. They are wide like she has them pinned open with invisible toothpicks. She writes, so it's the hottie TA. She sniffs again.

Maybe she's getting a cold.

Are you sick? I write.

No, she answers.

Okay.

A slight breeze moves my hair, and I immediately know why. Austin is at our row. My pulse is pounding so loud like it wants to knock me over, drag me down, and punch me out.

I should stay away from him.

He's probably dangerous, like his father.

But my body doesn't give a crap what I think.

The sight of Austin, the way he moves, stands, and breathes; he makes my body aches in places I didn't know could ache.

The cotton balls in my mouth are now accompanied by sandpaper.

Don't look at him. Don't look at him. Don't look at him. I chant those words over and over.

But I can't resist, and I glance at him through my lashes.

He shakes his head, glances at the paper Sage and I have been writing on, and then smiles, an enormous, beautiful, all-consuming smile. At me.

He read what we wrote. My face heats, and my hands start to shake. I'm humiliated.

Sage laughs, and takes the stack of papers he hands her, grabs one, and passes the rest to me. I do the same, giving them to the next person.

Never in the history of syllabuses has the one in my hands been more interesting. I pretend to focus, keeping my eyes on my paper, praying my heart will slow down.

Seconds that feel like hours slip by, and Sage sets the condemning paper on my desk. On it is masculine writing with a number and the words, call me!

OceanofPDF.com

CAN'T HELP MYSELF

WYSTERIA

Ms. Spears is still talking. Probably about the syllabus, but I can't hear a word.

La Traviata: Prelude to Act 1 is playing in my head, the aching opening notes matching the feeling in my heart.

My lips part, and I let out a noise, which causes Sage to glance at me.

I shrug, mortified at the reaction I'm having to him. I'm losing all grasp on reality.

Still, I can't help myself.

I watch Austin descending and am mesmerized by the way his shoulder blades move effortlessly under his shirt, the way his muscles flex when he takes a step.

Sage steals the paper and scribbles four words, meaningless when separated, but together they bring my face to scalding.

You want him bad, it says.

I take a deep breath, working to convince myself her words aren't right. That any feelings I'm harboring are residual from when I was younger.

I've seen the way the current Austin behaves, and there is nothing about him to like.

Except for his smile.

And his eyes.

His damn fine body.

And the way he moves, like a predator stalking its prey.

Lithe. Liquid.

An image of the two of us kissing enters my head, and my body warms.

I shake my head and try to glare at her.

Sage covers her mouth with a hand, stifling a laugh.

I squeeze my thighs together, forcing myself to listen to Ms. Spears and her overdramatic ruminations.

When class is over, I follow Sage out of the room and into the hallway.

My next class is Biology.

First, I need to head back to my dorm and get a water.

“Who is he?” Sage asks as we slowly push our way outside.

I ignore her, focusing on the landscape surrounding us.

The pine trees and the wild daisies, the red bushes, and the crabapple trees.

In the far distance are the Rocky Mountains.

The grass on campus is lush and green.

With Wyoming’s harsh winters, it won’t last much longer.

I sigh and inhale a deep breath. The air is crisp.

“Wysteria?” she says, smacking my arm.

“What?” I respond automatically, then sigh heavily. I’ve got to tell her something.

Not that Austin was my first crush or the first and only person I dreamed of marrying.

I won’t tell her how his father killed my parents. I can’t tell her any of that.

Instead, I say, “He’s some guy from the party Friday night.”

“Uh-huh. I need details. You act like you’re ready to have his babies.” Sage is half running to keep up with me and still be able to see my face.

“No, I’m not,” I say, stomping toward Irvine Hall.

“Um, yeah.” Sage laughs. “He’s cute, and you’re smitten. Is he good in bed? Is that why you left that night? You two hooked up?”

“Stop,” I tell her, picking up my pace. Anything to get away from her questions.

I don’t want to talk about this. It infuriates me that I don’t have more sense, more control over my reaction to him.

A person can change a lot in seven years.

I’ve sure as hell changed.

The last time Austin saw me, I’d been a happy, altruistic, glass-half-full kind of girl.

Not anymore.

But I can’t help thinking about his number. He wanted me to call. Should I?

No!

I take the elevator up to the tenth floor.

Sage follows, but I hurry away.

She doesn’t say anything until we’re in our room.

“Hey, I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to upset you.” She sits on her bed, and I finally take the time to really look at her.

Not too many days ago, she was a ball of broken curled on her bed, hugging a one-eyed teddy bear to death.

Her eyes are still kind of wild, and she’s jittery. I’m guessing too much caffeine.

“I don't want to talk about him.” That's the truth and I hope she'll leave it alone.

I take a water bottle from our mini fridge. Crack the lid and take a drink. “I’ve got biology. What about you?”

She flips on her stereo, blaring it loud, and I get the feeling she’s mad.

“Sage?” I touch her on the arm.

She jumps like I've physically hurt her. I quickly tuck my hands behind my back.

She rubs her nose with a finger, sniffles. "I don't have another class until one o'clock." She picks up her purse and goes to the door. "I've got to pee. Want to meet at Perky's for lunch?"

"Okay," I reply, but she's already gone.

TWO FULL WEEKS of school have gone by and I haven't died. No one has tried to take me.

Maybe my brother was wrong.

I've been living my life, just like I wanted.

Except I haven't talked to Austin since that first day in class.

I should be glad. Now that I know it was his dad who killed my parents, I should hate Austin by association.

Instead, I ache at his absence.

To take my mind off him, I've been practicing piano for hours at a time and doing homework.

Professor Jenkins, my music teacher, loved the piece I played for him. Said I have a real future - whatever that means - and asked me to play a duet for the end of year Winter Gala.

I agreed, of course.

Playing the duet will guarantee me a full-ride scholarship for the next year.

In a few weeks, I'm supposed to meet my partner so we can choose our song and begin practicing together. The Professor didn't give me a name. He was mysterious about it, or maybe he was vague because he isn't sure who my partner will be yet.

The prospect of doing something musical calms my nerves.

When I was stuck in my tower, music was my balm, the one thing that brought me comfort. Plus, practicing means less time thinking about Austin. Less time pining for a man I don't even know.

But no matter what I do, no matter how hard I try, I can't stop thinking about him.

The paper he wrote his phone number on is folded small and stuffed in my back pocket. It feels like a fifty-pound weight.

Every time I move, I feel it.

I keep pulling it out, studying it, deliberating.

Several times, I put the numbers into the phone my aunt and uncle gave me, but I always delete them before I actually call.

I want to throw the blasted paper away. Toss it, and every thought of Austin, right in the trash.

Doing so would make my life so much easier.

I managed to do it once.

Five minutes later, I pulled it out.

"Why don't you burn it?" Sage asks when she walks into our room and catches me staring at it again. She pulls a lighter from her pocket and flicks it on. "Go on, set the sucker on fire."

Like a moth, I move toward the flame, holding the paper out.

It's a good idea.

If I torch it, the unpleasant thing will be gone, and I can't gawk anymore, even if I want to.

The heat licks my fingers and catches the edge of the paper on fire.

But I can't go through with it. I blow it out.

"Call the dude," she says, tucking the lighter back in the pocket of her black leather jacket.

"I can't," I say as smoke caresses the air.

"I get that he's gorgeous. Hell, if you weren't my roommate, I'd be all over him, but still, he's just a guy." She laughs, sniffs, rubbing her nose a little.

I glare. "What's your problem?" I ask, heading to the door. Her nose has been runny for days, and I'm concerned.

Sage shakes her head, clears her throat. “Maybe a cold or allergies. All the freakin’ tumbleweeds are getting to my sinuses.” She grabs a tissue and wipes her nose.

“Probably,” I say, even though it feels like a lie.

But I mean, she did grow up in Chicago.

At least that’s what she tells me. When I ask what she’s doing in little Gothel Springs, she gets vague.

I wonder if someone’s after her.

That could be another thing we have in common, but she won’t tell me.

“What about the other day? After the party. You were so sad. We still haven’t talked about what happened. Is everything okay?” I ask the question tenderly, hoping she'll finally talk to me about it.

She waves me off, but I catch a glimmer of sadness cross her face. “I’m good. Better than good actually, and tonight we party again.”

“I’m not - ”

“No excuses. I’m going to give you a makeover.” She turns her music up louder.

I nod and push my lips into a smile. “Sounds fun,” I shout.

It doesn’t sound fun.

I’m worried about her idea of a makeover.

But I get the feeling she needs something to look forward to.

"Later," I say, and leave our dorm, walking to the elevators. Several other students enter as well.

When the doors are closed, a girl with straight black hair asks, “What’s burning?” She’s searching the elevator for the culprit.

I’m guessing she smells the singed edges of the paper tucked away in my pocket. I keep my eyes down, staring at nothing.

A phone vibrates, and one of the guys pulls his cell out of his pocket.

His fingers click across the screen.

I could text Austin. That might be easier.

On the sidewalk outside Irvine Hall, I pull out my phone and enter his number. Then stare at the screen, debating what to say.

Just as I start typing, someone bumps into me, and my phone crashes to the ground. I bend to pick it up, but before I can, a giant foot freaking steps on it, crushing it.

“What the hell? Watch where you’re going.” I glance up, and it’s another basketball player. He looks like a giant.

“Hey, sorry. I didn’t see you there.” He bends down and picks it up. “Damn, it’s destroyed.” He hands it to me. “You should be more careful.”

“Thanks for the tip,” I say, frustrated as he jogs to catch up with his friends. The glass is smashed, but I try to use it anyway. The screen flashes, but won’t work.

“I guess that takes care of that.”

OceanofPDF.com

IT'S NOT A DISEASE

WYSTERIA

“You look hot!” Sage squeals as she applies the last of my mascara. She’s in full makeover mode.

“Even with all the hair,” she adds. She mentioned cutting it, but I told her no.

I could’ve said it was impossible to cut, but that would’ve opened us up to a whole new level in our friendship, and I don't think Sage is ready for that.

I hop off the bed and check my reflection.

Sage has lined my eyes in a smoky gray liner. A darker shade of gray is on my lids, and she’s put on several coats of mascara. On my lips and cheeks, she put light pink lip-gloss and a touch of blush.

She ended up braiding my hair in a reverse french braid, which looks fantastic.

I wonder if Austin will like it, I think, and then mentally kick myself.

“Wow, Sage.” I carefully run my hand down the braid. "It looks and feels so cool."

“Yeah, I know. The guys are going to be fighting over who gets to go home with you.” She pushes me back down onto the bed.

“Especially one in particular.” She sniffles. She still has a cold or allergies, it seems. “I got the scoop for you, by the way.”

I turn to face her. “The scoop?”

“Yeah, the scoop about Hottie TA.” She spritzes hair spray along my braid to keep it in place.

I clear my throat. “And?” I don’t want to give anything away.

He doesn’t seem to care about me, so I’m going to pretend I don’t know anything about him.

Like the fact that he used to sleep with a nightlight. Or that he would tickle my back so, so gently while we listened to music. His favorite band was The Cure, and he wanted to be a poet when he grew up.

Once, he wrote me a poem. I don't have it anymore, but I have it memorized.

You make me laugh.

I'm torn in half.

When I'm with you, I feel whole.

I'll never let you go.

That's the Austin I remember. Sweet. Kind. Caring. And a little dorky.

College Austin doesn't even seem real, but I know it's him, a version of him I don't understand, but still, it's him.

"Earth to Wysteria. Come in, Wysteria." Sage snaps her fingers in front of my face.

"Oh, sorry," I say, and smile. "Thanks again for fixing me up. I love the dress, though the shoes make me wobbly."

She sniffles. "You're welcome. Now, do you want the scoop or not?"

"Sure," I say, standing, following Sage to the door.

It's ten-thirty on a Friday night. The perfect time to get the party started, according to Sage. I have to admit I'm excited about going to another party.

"His name is Austin Morrison," she begins.

That I already know.

"He's a junior, and apparently our English teacher, Witchy Spears, thinks he's a genius."

I didn't know that. Maybe he still writes poetry.

Her eyes meet mine. “He’s kind of - how can I say this without harming your sensibilities.” She raises an eyebrow. “Loose with the women,” she finally finishes. Snickers.

“There are rumors he might be a vampire, but according to his cousin, he isn’t. His dad was half-elf, which would make him one-quarter,” she continues.

We’re riding the elevator by ourselves, and I watch her, wondering what she’s getting at.

“What’s it like having an angel for a dad?” I ask, deciding to change the subject.

She makes a face. “Boring,” she says. “He’s always working. Either with the Supernatural Task Force or teaching at the school,” she says and rolls her eyes. “Keeping the - ” She stops and looks at me. “You’re supernatural, too, aren’t you.”

It isn’t a question but a statement. “Yeah,” I say, wrapping my arms around myself.

She squints her eyes and studies me. “I’d guess elven blood and something else.”

“You’re good,” I respond, but don’t elaborate.

“I thought so.” She taps her nose.

“Have you ever met a vampire?” With the death at school and the suspect being a vampire, not to mention my newfound brother is a vampire, the bloodsuckers are on my mind.

At my question, she physically shudders. “Why would you ask me that?”

“Sorry,” I say, surprised by her response and eyeing her curiously.

“Every vampire I’ve met is either a douche or an arrogant asshole,” Sage adds. “In fact, I have a plan for a few of them.”

“What, like a spell?” It’s against the law to do unauthorized magic, but Sage doesn’t seem to care. Plus, there’s more she isn’t telling me.

“A witch never reveals her secrets.” She giggles lightly. Then changes the subject back to Austin. “I hope for all our sakes, Austin isn’t a vampire, but either way, he might be more than you can handle.”

I lean against the handles along the elevator walls and don’t tell her he can’t be a vampire. I knew him when he was young. “You’re probably right.”

“And from what I learned, he’s made the rounds more than once,” she adds.

“What do you mean, rounds?” My eyes blink several times as I try to imagine what she’s saying. I think I know, but I don’t want to be right.

“Dang, roomie. Have you been living in a nunnery?”

“I - ” I’m going to tell her the truth, but the elevator opens on the main level. There are dozens of students in the common area. We silently push through and head outside.

Once we’re basically alone again, she shakes her head. “He’s done a lot of dating with his penis.” She speaks slowly like that’s supposed to help.

I open my mouth. Close it. My heart is pounding. I’m way out of my league.

Which is what you want, I tell myself.

“I - ” How do I respond to that? I have no words. So, I don't say anything. Not about where I've been and the reason I'm naive. Besides, now all I can think about is Austin's penis.

Her brows pinch together. “Are you a virgin, Wysteria Hart?”

My face heats up. “So, what if I am?” What’s the big deal? I’m sure lots of people are virgins.

Austin is the only guy I ever wanted to give myself to. And his dad killed my parents. That knowledge kind of takes the romance out of everything.

“I’m blown away.” Sage scrunches her hair and walks in a circle. “I mean, wow, wow, wow. This is serious. I've never been friends with a virgin."

"Sheesh, get over yourself. It isn't like I have a contagious disease." I cross my arms.

"You're right, it isn't, but it might be worse."

"Sheesh," I say studying my roommate.

Tonight, Sage's wearing a black bustier attached to a tutu. It's lacy and hooks in the front, with long black bow ties under her chest. Black leggings and her ankle boots complete the outfit.

Her eyes are lined in black again, and her hair is everywhere, but flawlessly placed. She looks gorgeous, but something feels off.

I'm guessing it has something to do with vampires and whatever happened the night we attended our first college party.

Her clothes make me wish I could be so daring. She put me in a red sheath dress. My legs are bare, and I'm wearing red strappy heels. I'm an inch taller, but Sage and I wear the same size clothes and shoes.

This outfit is bolder than I've ever been.

Nothing like the long dresses I wore in the other realm.

At that, I think of Leva. I miss her terribly and wish I hadn't sent her away.

"Okay, I get it," I say, adjusting my cleavage. "You're shocked I'm a virgin. Whatever. Let's get to this party already."

She grabs my arms and looks directly into my eyes. Hers are twinkling with surprise, shock, and maybe disgust. "Wow," she says again, this time smiling.

"Wh-when did you do it?" I ask, glancing down at her tutu.

"I was fourteen." Her voice trembles slightly, and she covers her mouth. "Don't ever repeat that." She glances around to make sure we're alone. "My parents would kill me and probably the guy I did it with, too."

I look at her. “They would - ”

“Totally kill me,” she finishes.

A part of me wants to tell her about myself. About my time in the tower and my parents actually being dead, but I can’t.

“I think we have to do what’s right for ourselves,” I finally finish.

She laughs, her face filled to brimming, shocked joy. “If you could see yourself. Someday you’ll tell me what you actually meant to say.”

OceanofPDF.com

HEAVEN OR HELL

WYSTERIA

Tonight's party is by invitation only.

The card in Sage's hand is fancy, printed on thick paper, and embossed with a phoenix. Every once in a while, it flies off the page, circles around us, and then returns to its position. I'm guessing that particular magic is allowed.

Sage is taking me as her plus one. It's being held at another fraternity, but I forget the name. She got the invite from some guy in her Biology class.

The party theme? Heaven or Hell.

I should've known that was code for slutty.

When we arrive, a guy takes our invitation and directs us to a sitting room. All the guys are in suits and ties, except the pledges; they're wearing black pants and black bow ties. No shirts. And they're carrying around silver trays of cider that literally sparkle. When I take the offered drink, it tickles my nose.

"This party is lame." Sage is leaning back in a plush love seat, and I'm sitting next to her. She rests her head in her palm and closes her eyes.

"Total snooze," I agree, though I'm too nervous to be bored. All I can think about is seeing Austin.

The décor in the sitting room is luxurious. The furniture is black leather. The carpet is white, and the curtains are black and white. Greenery - plants, shrubs, and trees - are spread throughout the room, and paintings - Van Gogh, Klimt, and an artist I don't know - are hanging on the walls. A black grand piano is off to one side, and a guy in a tux is playing "Suite No. 2" from Romeo and Juliet. There's even a sparkly chandelier hanging from the ceiling.

People are milling around, chatting quietly. One guy appears to be sleeping. The whole scenario reminds me of a party from the book The Great Gatsby.

"Where's everyone else?" I ask, and immediately regret it.

Sage raises an eyebrow. "You've got it so bad."

I pretend not to know what she means and shrug. "Is this fraternity for wealthy kids or something?" I whisper.

"I guess. If this is how they party, then rich people are too uppity for my tastes." Her right leg is bouncing up and down. She's antsy.

A clock on the mantle says it's nearly eleven.

"Should we get out of here?"

"Yeah." She looks around the room in disgust. "Snooty and boring. Eesh." She stands, and I'm about to follow when a guy in a tux walks in.

He's handsome in that someday-I'll-be-a-senator way.

"My name is Sam. I'm the president of Alpha Kai. If you'll please follow me." He turns and walks from the room.

Everyone rushes forward. Excited whispers fill the room.

"What's happening?"

"Where are we going?"

Sage and I follow the crowd.

"Should we duck out? It looks like he's leading us past the front door," Sage says.

I'm curious, though. "Let's see where he's taking us."

Sam walks us through the kitchen and then opens a door.

"Welcome to Hell," he says with a grand flourish. A huge grin lights up his dark brown face.

Several girls squeal with enthusiasm. It's like a herd of elephants clomping down the stairs.

Sage and I exchange a look.

Loud music is pumping below.

Without a word to each other, we make our way down.

At the bottom is a thick black curtain. Another shirtless guy with a bow tie holds it back. Beyond, mist dances in the flashing lights, and it smells erotic, like cocoa butter, vanilla, and coconut oil. Somehow, the aroma fits perfectly with the music. This is what I meant when I said I wanted to live my life. I push back the curtain and can hardly believe my eyes.

“This is more like it!” Sage hollers, moving past me, her hands in the air as she sways to the music.

A disco ball sends sparkling lights around the room to the beat of the music. There are girls in bikinis dancing around poles on small circular stages. Their movements are slow and seductive.

In the center of the room is a dance floor. Dozens of college kids are jumping up and down, partying like there’s no tomorrow. To the right are small round tables. Couches shaped in a C are nestled around them. Behind the chairs is a bar. Shirtless guys are whipping up drinks. The room is packed. And I wonder why they kept us waiting around upstairs for so long.

Like the last party, the music, the energy, and the idea of drinking push away the pain that’s continually dwelling in my soul. Here, it’s too loud to feel anything but the beat.

I glance at Sage. She is swaying, and I get the feeling being here pushes away whatever sadness she harbors as well. Since I consider her my friend, I decide we need to get to know each other better.

A pretty boy with blond highlights, wearing only red boxers, sticks a tray in my face and smiles. “Jell-O shot?”

Surprised, I step back. “What’s in it?” I ask, wrinkling my nose.

He leans in and whispers in my ear. “Heaven.”

My face heats up, and I have no idea why. But I figure I’ll give it a try. He hands me a cup filled with blue Jell-O. I don't know what to do with it.

Sage grabs a yellow one, tips it, and squeezes the contents into her mouth. She shakes her head and swallows. "Yummy." She tosses the empty cup on the tray, picks up another, and does it again.

"Give it a try," the guy says, smirking at Sage.

I'm still hesitant until Sage adds, "It's filled with booze."

I can't help the smile that breaks over my face. "Sweet."

The mostly-naked guy and Sage laugh. "I guess I should've led with that," the guy says.

My mind is reeling, ready for the gooey warmth that comes with the potent liquid. I tip back the small cup. The contents fall into my mouth, and I swallow. "Mmm. Good."

"Have another," Boxer Guy offers.

I take a red one and tip it back. "It's like candy," I say and do a third.

The music changes to a song I know. My body moves on its own.

"The best kind of candy," he says. "My name is Doug, by the way." He sticks out his hand, and I shake it.

"Hi. I'm Wysteria."

"Nice to meet you."

Someone shrieks, and we turn. Sage has jumped on one of the stages and is moving her backside against the pole. The scream must've come from the girl Sage kicked off.

I'm a little horrified.

"Your friend's name is Sage, right?" Doug asks.

I search his face. He's watching her, a strange look on his face. Then he clears his throat. "I've heard about her. Sage is a party girl. That's why we invited her."

He hasn't said anything that isn't true. Obviously, she likes to have fun. But, for some reason, the way he said her name makes me want to lock him up and throw away the key. “What did you hear?”

He turns to me. “Oh, nothing. Hey, you want another shot?”

The alcohol buzz hasn’t hit me yet. “Sure.” I tip it back.

Doug moves closer and runs a hand along my waist.

My heart jumps into my throat. His hand on my body does not feel right.

“Want to come to my room? I can show you things that will make you - ”

“Go refill your tray, grunt!” The command has come from behind us.

We both jump.

Doug turns toward the voice, and I follow.

It’s Austin, dressed in a black suit, a crisp white shirt, and a black tie. At the sight of him, I melt into a puddle on the floor. The man can rock jeans and a tee shirt or this look. I'll take either.

“Don’t be a douche,” Doug seethes.

“I’ll be whatever I want. You, on the other hand, are to be nothing more than a waiter.”

“That girl’s a tease. I didn’t do anything she didn’t want - ” Doug begins.

Austin rams his hand into Doug’s throat and opens his mouth slightly. “Finish that sentence, and you’re out.” Austin pushes him away.

Doug coughs and sputters. “Asshole. You’ll be hearing from my lawyer.” He grabs at his throat and stalks away.

“I can’t wait to talk to your lawyer, tell him about the tests you aced but didn’t study for, the side hustle you’ve got running with the trolls in 7D, and the - ”

“Asshole!” Doug shouts again.

“Yeah, I’m an asshole. Remember that the next time you think about getting handsy.” Austin shakes his head when Doug flips him off before disappearing into the crowd. Then he faces me, and his expression changes. Softens. “Stay away from that guy. He’s messed up.”

“I will,” I say, enjoying the way my insides are warming, and my inhibitions are disappearing.

We study each other, and I imagine two assassins sizing each other up before going in for the kill. Okay, wrong analogy since I am no assassin-at least not officially. All the things my parents taught me have come back, and I’m sure if I tried, I could use them to hurt someone. But this? Between Austin and me. It’s more like a hunter sizing up his prey. Thoughts of his teeth grazing my neck, his hands pulling me to him -

Is he a vampire? Could the rumors be true? Is that what’s different about him?

“Hey,” he says, moving closer.

I don’t respond right away, thinking I must be right. He is a vampire. But how? When? It’s against the law for a vampire to change a human. Snow White put the law in motion, and it was passed by all governments. I know what will happen in the supernatural hunters find out. In the same moment, a surge of protectiveness overpowers me. I’m sure it’s the alcohol talking, but I don’t care who his father is. I want him, and I’ll do anything to keep him safe. Vampire or not. And that’s a revelation.

“Want to dance?” He’s so close I have to tilt my head to see his eyes.

Austin, I think, remembering the guy I used to love. Austin didn’t kill my parents.

A man this beautiful cannot be evil. He’s made the rounds - “Tell me what that means,” I blurt, my face getting hot because I said what I’m thinking aloud. I’m scalded with mortification.

He chuckles. It's low and sexy, meant only for me. "Are we talking about the meaning of life or something else?" He's smiling - his perfect lips, framing perfect teeth, attached to a flawless face.

"Never mind," I blush hotter, grateful for the party lights and the darkness. He's so close I can feel his breath on my face. Sweet. And I wonder how many shots he's had. Whether his lips taste like lemon or strawberry. Orange or lime. My fingers touch his lips. It feels like forever since we kissed. I imagine they'll feel like a pillow or a cloud. Hell has beautiful scenery, I think, my body moving up, placing me on a collision course with his lips.

He presses his to mine briefly before sweeping me onto the dance floor. We move as one. He puts his hands on my hips, and I wrap my arms around his neck.

"You're beautiful," I say and know it's the shots talking. But I don't care.

"So are you," he says, his gaze lingering on my mouth. "You never called. I thought you didn't want to spend time with me."

I pull back. "Um, yeah, sorry. My phone broke."

His fingers are touching my arms, scorching a trail. "Do you want to get out of here?"

"With you?" I ask, unable to tear my eyes from his face. My hands are on his chest. I'm not sure when I put them there, but they feel like they're in precisely the right place.

He chuckles again. "Yes, with me." His eyes roam around the room before they return to my face.

"I would love to," I say. My words are slurred, and I cover my mouth. Not only that, but my legs feel like rubber bands. The shots have hit me like a ton of bricks.

"Come on," he says, wrapping an arm around my hips.

OceanofPDF.com

BODY AND KISS

AUSTIN

Wysteria is so drunk I have to carry her to my Jeep. She keeps touching me, almost like she's making sure I'm real. It's sweet, and I'm protective of her. At the same time, my fangs press against the inside of my mouth. I want all of her. Blood, body, and soul. It takes everything in me not to drink her dry right here in the parking lot.

But I resist and get her buckled.

"I love you - Austin is a vampire - "

At her words, I freeze. "Wys, what did you way?" Did Christopher tell her what I am? I wouldn't put it passed him even though he swore he wouldn't tell anyone. "No longer a virgin - "

Holy hell, my body aches for her. But more than that, I care, so I shut the damn door and drive away from the party.

"Don't leave - The tower - Leva - "

I'm guessing she misses her friend. The pixilette saved her life. But Wysteria sent her away so she could be normal. I still think it's a bad idea. Had Leva remained, Wysteria would've had extra protection. But Wysteria wouldn't hear of it.

"Sad, sad, sad."

From the sounds of it, Wysteria misses her friend more than she realizes. The next chance I get, I'll tell Christopher.

"It's okay, Wysteria. I'll keep you safe." Her dress is hiked up to her hips, revealing way too much. Or not enough. I try to be respectful, but the girl is stunning. Every magnificent inch of her and she smells so damn good. One taste, I think, and move in, feeling I'll graze the skin along her neck.

Her eyes pop open, and for the briefest moment, I think the alcohol has completely burned off. “Where are you taking me?” she mutters, her head flopping from side to side.

“My place,” I answer, and pull back, steeling myself and put a hand in hers.

She tightens her fingers around mine, places her other hand on top. “I’ve missed you, Austin. I’ve missed home. I miss my mom and dad. Remember when I was going to marry you?”

The last part makes no sense. Marry me? I don’t recall that conversation. But the idea that she ever considered her and me together in that way does something to my insides. Between that and the scent of her blood, I’m ravenous for her.

“Shot. Blood everywhere.” Tears fall to her cheeks as she babbles.

“I’m so sorry,” I say and wish not for the first time since becoming a vampire that alcohol could have an effect on me. But it doesn’t, and I can’t even feel sorry for myself. There’s so much pain rolling off her I can feel it as if it were my own. She’s as broken as I am. We need each other, whether we can admit it or not.

She laughs, and I’m surprised until I understand why. A guy is standing on the curb, peeing into the street. “Gross,” she says.

I chuckle. “Hold tight.” I place my arm across her body, protecting her. Make a right and pull into my apartment complex.

“You live here?” she asks when I open the door on her side.

“Yep.” I unbuckle her, and she falls against me, her cheek on my chest.

“You smell good. Mmmmmm. Austin. Austin. Austin.” Her voice breaks, and she’s crying again. “Why?”

“Can you walk?” I ask, clearing my throat. I haven’t shed a tear since my mom died, and definitely not when my dad died a few years later. But seeing Wysteria cry, recognizing all of the sadness in her, is choking me up.

Wysteria wraps her arms around my neck. “I never want to feel trapped again," she whispers.

I don't understand what she's saying. Does she feel like I'm holding her hostage? I lift her into my arms. "Hang on." She isn't in any shape to answer questions coherently.

Wysteria weighs next to nothing, even if I wasn't a vampire. Her body settles against my chest. Her head resting on my shoulder. She snuggles her face into my neck, and I feel the wetness of her tears.

My apartment is at the top of the stairs. When I reach the landing, I set her down so I can unlock the door. She keeps her arms around my neck.

Evan walks out of his apartment, a cigarette in one hand and a beer in the other. "Looks like you got your hands full, bro. Want some help?"

"Nah, it's all good." I unlock my door and carry her into my apartment and close the door with my foot.

Evan sticks his damned boot in the way. "What's her name?" Evan asks, flicking his cigarette away.

"It's Wysteria," I say, annoyed he's followed me in.

"She'll break your heart all over again. I thought you were going to blow her off."

"Get out," I growl, annoyed, working hard not to flash my fangs. Why am I still friends with him? Oh yeah, because he's family.

Wysteria takes a deep breath and sighs; her lips press against my neck. There are so many things I want to do to her right now. Instead, I carry her into my room and lay her on my bed.

"Whoa, she tramped it up tonight. No more Pudgy Wudgy, huh? Look at those legs. And that ass." He chugs the rest of his beer, his eyes raking over Wysteria's body. It's obvious he's on something else as well as alcohol. Probably a drug spell. When those witches concoct something, it's worse than acid.

"I've asked you nicely once. Don't make me ask again," I snap. My nerves are shot, and my patience is gone. I won't have him talk about her like she's a piece of meat.

I walk out of my room and into the kitchen. Grab a water bottle and twist it open. It's all for show. Water does nothing for me, but no one can know.

Evan follows me. Sets his empty bottle on the counter and grabs himself a new one from my fridge. He's shorter and less broad than I am. He's also a two-time kickboxing champion, but I'm a vampire, so I win. I grin internally.

I push him toward the door. "Out."

Evan lifts an eyebrow, daring me to challenge him. "You gonna break your hand on my face again, cousin?"

"If I have to," I say, thinking about the last time we fought. That was before Christopher changed me. This time things would end much differently. "Leave."

Evan smirks. "I don't think so. This is too much fun." He takes a pull on his beer and tries to skirt around me.

I swear silently and try another tactic. "Look, man. I want to be alone with her. All right." I smile, letting him believe I have less than honorable intentions. "We have a lot of catching up to do if you know what I mean."

He smacks me on the arm. "Why didn't you say that in the first place?" He peeks around my shoulder. "She's hot. Mind if I have a turn when you're finished?"

It takes every ounce of self-discipline I own not to haul off and punch him. But I want him gone. "We'll see," I respond.

He ruffles my hair. "Have fun, bro. Don't do anything I wouldn't do."

I snort and smack his hand away. "Oh, I'm sure I will." I walk him to the front door.

When it's closed, I lock it, breathing deeply, convincing myself I need to relax.

I can't help my frustration, though. Since my mother died, he's treated me more like a brother than a cousin. But Evan's got no respect for women - for anyone, really. Most times, I go along with Evan's shenanigans, but when it comes to Wysteria, I won't budge even a little bit. With her, it's different. It always has been.

I'm about to walk into my room when I hear shouting coming from outside. I want to ignore it, and I decide to when something slams against my door.

"Evan," I grumble and pull open the door.

Some guy I've seen before but don't know is crumpled on the ground. He smells like magic.

"Get up." I kick him slightly.

He groans, but he isn't going anywhere. He's out cold.

Evan is at the bottom of the stairs. A couple of guys stand in front of him. One of the guys says, "Manny wanted his money yesterday."

"I'll have it tomorrow. I told him that when I saw him earlier today." Evan lights up another cigarette and blows it into the guy's face.

"Sure. Of course. But Manny wanted us to stop by and make sure you understand he's serious. If he doesn't get the money tomorrow, he's going to your father. And we both know you don't want that."

Evan clears his throat. "You'll get the money, dammit."

I know my cousin is into some shady shit, but he's obviously gone way over what he can handle. And my uncle? What did he know about it? I doubt he's involved, but the guy makes it seem like he is.

The guy not talking to Evan walks over to the stairs and looks up at me, giving me his full attention. "What you looking at, dick weed? Get back inside and mind your business."

I'm half tempted to listen. Turn around and disappear inside my apartment. Evan got himself into trouble. I should let him be the one to get himself out. But that isn't in me. I can't leave him alone to deal with these guys, even if he is a pain in the ass. "Why don't you and your friend do us all a favor and get out of here?"

The guy smiles a vile grin that shows off his gold front teeth. "How about I break your hands first, piano boy?"

I glance down. The guy has me at a disadvantage. He knows who I am.

"I can't believe he's part of your family," Golden-Teeth says to Evan. "Your uncle must be so proud."

The guy snorts. "What a pansy."

Evan chuckles, giving me a barely-there nod. It's his non-verbal way of telling me to stay chill.

I'm not feeling that, though. It's time to kick the guy's teeth in. "Why don't you say that to my face," I say, heading down the stairs.

Golden-Teeth rolls his eyes. "Pans - "

Before he finishes, I send my fist into the guy's jaw. Not as hard as I can, but close. His head snaps back, and he falls to the ground, out cold.

OceanofPDF.com

HEAD SPINS FASTER

WYSTERIA

I'm not sure how I get to his room. My vision is blurry. I think four Jell-O shots were four too many. My stomach is in knots, rebelling against the sugar and the alcohol swimming inside. A moan escapes my throat.

"How are you feeling?"

My head snaps in his direction. "Austin," I whisper.

The room spins, and he helps me sit up.

"Give me your feet, I'll help you with your shoes." His voice is tender. Smooth, like chinchilla fur, and I think about stroking him.

Instead, I focus. He wants to help me take off my shoes. My feet are screaming, yes! There are probably a thousand blisters. "Please." I lay down, hoping my head will stop spinning. The pillow smells like him. It's earthy, manly, with a hint of vanilla, and I take a deep breath through my nose.

He unhooks my shoes, slips them off. "These are deadly." He chuckles, tossing them away.

"They're Sage's." I close my eyes, but my head spins faster. "Whoa."

"Hang on."

I hear him move away, and I miss him. Water runs in the background. He returns quickly.

My eyes peel open. "You're back," I say and try to smile.

My hands find his arms. He helps me up.

"Take these." He hands me a plastic cup and two white pills.

"What are they?" I try to gauge his facial expressions. "You aren't trying to drug me, are you?"

He kneels beside the bed so I can see his face without looking up. "I wouldn't do that," he says softly, and I want to lose myself in him.

I focus on his eyes and sigh. They're such a strange shade of blue. Like the way ice looks at sunset.

"Why don't you kiss me?" I slide off the bed, onto his knees.

He catches me, rests his hands on my hips, and holds me steady. My dress is around my waist, but I can't make myself care to fix it. His body feels so good, and I promise myself that I'll stay here forever.

Austin shakes his head. There's something in his expression. Like he's trying to make a decision, or maybe he's in pain. His movement spins my head like a merry-go-round.

"It's been too long," he says and groans, pushing some of my hair off my shoulder, sending tingles along my skin. His hands are so gentle, and I can't help but imagine them everywhere. Against my back, dragging along my thighs.

I shudder. "Austin." I close my eyes, tilting my face toward his. "Kiss me. Please."

He inhales. Touches my lips with his fingers.

I close my eyes, eager for him.

They press against mine softly, like a whisper, and I let out a sound at the feel of him.

"Harder," I say, my hands on his face as I press into him.

He complies, pushing my mouth open and exploring me with his tongue. I reciprocate, tentative at first. He tastes good, like toothpaste, and I breathe him in, thinking there will never be a better moment in all of my life than this one.

He lifts me like I weigh nothing and lays me down. I grab hold of his shoulders, wanting him here with me, but he moves away. I try to open my eyes, but they're so heavy. Damn alcohol. I don't think I like it as much anymore.

A soft weight covers me, and I know it's his blanket. I can smell him on it.

"Sleep well, princess," he says.

Instead of a dream, I have a memory. He was thirteen, and I was eleven -

"Why is your dad so mean?" I ask.

He wipes angry tears off his face. Stares up at his dull white ceiling. I lay beside him and watch the light flicker. The bulb's been about to die for weeks.

"I watched him leave," I say. "He seemed - um, grouchy."

Austin snorts. Rubs his jaw in the spot where his dad hit him. "That's an understatement," he says.

I pat his stomach, and I tingle. Austin has a way of making me feel better, no matter what's happening. "I'm sorry, Austin."

"Yeah, me too." Austin shrugs. Pushes the pillow behind his head into a ball and leans against it. "But what can I do?"

I lift my hair and press it against his cheek and near his eye. My magic flows to life as though something within senses, Austin needs healing. An indigo light shines against his cheek, turning my hair the same color for a moment. I know it comes from my father's unicorn blood. "Unicorns were healers first and foremost," my mom told me once. As the bruising on Austin's face vanishes, I know she's right. Weirdly, I can heal people, and I'm grateful for it - anything for Austin.

"Thanks." He touches my hair, staring at me wondrously. "Wanna listen to my new CD?"

I smile. It's so great he doesn't treat me like some weirdo. "If it's a song about bringing sexy back, I swear I'll snap it in half." I laugh, and he smacks me on the arm with the case.

"Rude! I guess I'll put it away." He pretends to for a moment and then changes his mind, leaning over me. He smells so good like man and vanilla. "It's The Fray," he says, looking at me like he wants to kiss me.

“Okay, let’s listen.” I can’t help but stare breathlessly at him. He does things to me. I can feel his heart beating rapidly against my chest. “But first, kiss me,” I say.

His gaze takes in my lips. Focuses on my eyes. I’m mesmerized by the way his features change, so I can almost always tell what he’s thinking. Like right now, he’s thoughtful. And as excited about what’s happening between us as I am.

“Like on the mouth?” he asks. A finger absently strokes my bottom lip.

I grab the finger and kiss it. “Yeah.”

It seems like a perfectly natural thing. He’s my best friend. The person I care about most in this world. Kissing him would be incredible. I know it.

His eyes find my lips again. “Okay.” His lips press against mine.

And I know there will never be another man for me. Not ever.

OceanofPDF.com

BURIED IN A PILLOW

WYSTERIA

I wake abruptly, my head pounding. Open my eyes and push back a scream.

Where am I?

There's pressure across my middle, and I look down. Even in the dark, I can make out an arm. A guy's arm. It's resting across my stomach. I turn my head ever so slightly and see him.

It's Austin. He's lying on his stomach with half his face is buried in a pillow. Nervous dread swallows me whole.

What have I done?

Carefully, so carefully, I try to scoot out from under his arm. I can't be here. I can't. I can't. But I have no idea where here is. I mean, I remember Austin telling me we were at his place, and I remember him kissing me, but - I touch my head. Alcohol is not my friend. Panic sets in. Did we do it?

Please, no.

And, Sage! I ditched her again. She probably thinks I'm the worst friend. She wouldn't be wrong. Sick horror fills my throat.

I scoot further away.

His hand tightens around my waist. "Don't go," Austin mumbles.

"I-Hi," I say, trying to play it cool. "I need a bathroom."

His eyes open, and he lifts up onto his forearms. My eyes take hold of his defined arm muscles and the rumpled waves in his hair. His features are soft from just waking. He's glorious.

Oh my.

He seems to notice where his hand is and grips my waist tighter, pulling me closer. “Nothing happened,” he says, probably reading the terrified look on my face. “I mean, we kissed. You remember kissing me?”

I press my lips together. “Yes,” I say and pray my face isn’t as red as it feels. My heart is beating so fast I fear it’ll burst through my chest, my skin, and reveal all my secrets.

His face shifts nearer to mine. I almost reach up and trace his jawline, his nose, and those lips. Run my fingers through his untamed hair, down the muscles on his back, his arms, and his chest, but I hold back.

“You asked me to kiss you.” He’s close, so close I can almost taste him.

“I’m sorry,” I say, peering at him under my lashes. “Maybe I shouldn’t have?” In the light of the day, I can’t help but think about his murderous father.

“It was amazing.” His voice is gruff, coursing with the desire I feel but can’t show.

My heart is bleeding, tearing itself into pieces. I want him to kiss me again. I do - more than anything. But if we were to go there, then what?

“Where’s your bathroom,” I ask, looking away.

Austin blows out a frustrated breath and climbs out of bed. I can’t help but notice he’s in nothing but boxer-briefs. They hug his legs and his butt in all the right places. He picks up a shirt and tugs it over his head. His body fascinates me, the way his back muscles tense when he moves.

“You should be more careful. If you’re going to go to a party, there are rules, like don’t have more than one shot and one regular drink, especially since you’re obviously such a lightweight.” He drags on his jeans.

My eyes follow his movements, but I keep quiet, too shocked that he’s scolding me to say anything in response. Not that I don’t deserve it.

He goes on, “And never, ever leave a party by yourself without telling someone. I could’ve been an ax murderer.” He shoots me a glare, his jaw tensing. Why is he so mad?

“You’re right,” I say and really look at him. Is he a vampire? I remember thinking that last night. As I study him now, I decide it's possible.

“You’re lucky I didn’t take advantage of you.” He runs a hand over his face, goes to his dresser, and picks up his phone.

I’m stupefied again. Watching him move is like hearing a heartbreaking melody. He’s the most beautiful person I’ve ever seen.

“Not that I would,” he goes on.

I swallow. His words have me boiling with shame, though, because he’s right. Every word he said is almost the same lecture I received from my aunt when she dropped me off.

“I’ll take you home. You’re staying in the dorms?”

“Yeah.” I untangle the sheets and climb out of his bed. I’m still in my dress. Obviously, nothing happened. That says a lot about Austin. He could’ve done whatever he wanted, but he didn’t. He took care of me, kept me safe. “Thanks,” I add.

“Don’t thank me yet. You left the party with me. People saw us together. Nearly every person at that party knows what happens when I leave with a girl.”

My mouth drops open, and I think of the girl he was with in the cafeteria. The one wearing the over-the-thigh socks. Sage said he’s made the rounds. My thoughts are spiraling into a dark place I never even imagined. I glance at Austin. He doesn’t look like that kind of guy. But then I’m clueless. Maybe he’s exactly that kind of guy. I’ve been gone a long time.

“Mind if I turn on a light?” Austin asks, pulling me out of my contemplations.

“No.” I can’t seem to find my shoes, or, more specifically, Sage’s shoes.

The light flickers on, and I catch him staring. “So, there might be talk - about you. I’m sorry.”

He’s apologizing? I can’t believe it. There’s no doubt that if Doug had taken me back to his place, the scenario would be different. I might not be a virgin any longer.

And I can’t help but think of Sage. Is that what she meant when she said she asked for it? My stomach twists, and my head whirls. I have to sit back down.

He walks over and picks up a glass full of water and two white pills. “I tried to get you to take these last night.”

I take the glass and the pills.

“They’re pain relievers. Nothing dangerous.” I hear the smile in his voice and glance at him. “The bathroom is in there.”

“Thanks.” I drink them down in two swallows, then chug until the water is gone, and set the glass back on the nightstand. The water is refreshing, and Austin is amazing. I don’t see or sense an evil bone in his body. Carefully, I go through the door he pointed at, close it, lock it, and do what I need to. After washing my hands, I open the door.

“Let’s go.” Austin is at his bedroom door, waiting for me to follow.

I sigh. Pick up Sage’s shoes. I’m not going to put them back on. My feet still throb. At the door, I glance around. His room is nice.

So is his place. Nothing fancy, but it isn’t disastrous. There are a few dishes in the sink. Empty beer bottles on the counter. The living room has a flat-screen, a couch, and two recliners. They look worn, but definitely not trashy. There’s a half bath off the living room, and two more doors on the other side. I’m guessing behind them are bedrooms, and I wonder if he has roommates.

We walk through the living room, and he opens the front door. A gust of cold wind blasts my face, making my eyes water. I step out, but he seizes my arm.

“Hang on.” He moves away, leaving the door open.

Cold, I walk over and close out the early morning air and raise an eyebrow. “Did you forget your keys?”

Austin doesn’t answer. Rushes to his bedroom.

The kitchen has a counter with two stools underneath. So, the person in the kitchen can cook and talk to everyone sitting in the living room. My aunt would say the space is functional.

“Put this on,” Austin says, coming back. He hands me a thick red sweatshirt.

My eyes light up. He’s surprised me again. “Thank you, Austin.” I pull it over my head.

He steps closer and gently tugs my ratty braid from the sweatshirt opening. “It’s way too big, but it’ll cover you up, keep you warm.”

For some reason, tears fill my eyes. It shocks me. I’m not much of a crier. I can’t decide whether it’s because I’m glad or sad or just hungover.

Whatever the problem, I can’t resist flinging myself into his chest, wrapping my arms around him. “Thank you,” I say again.

He doesn’t do anything at first. Just stands there. Finally, I feel his arms encircle me. And it isn’t a courtesy hug. He hugs me tight. “Anytime, Wys.”

At the way he says my nickname, my heart melts. But just as quickly, I have a feeling. What if he knows what his father did? I’d like to think he has no idea. But I can’t be sure. And then I remember why we can’t be together. I’ll always doubt him. Seeing his face will remind me of his father, of the evil in his family tree, and I can’t live with that.

“I’d better go,” I say, pulling away and opening the door.

He looks confused but swiftly recovers. “Sure.”

Austin leads me to a black Jeep. Somehow, it fits his personality - rugged, efficient, and intense. He opens the passenger door and helps me get in. My dad used to say, if a man gets your door, he's a keeper. It's a sign he'll treasure you.

As Austin pulls out of his parking spot, I glance at him and wonder if he's a keeper? I want him to be. But I'm so confused. Unsure about him and if it's possible to have a future.

Turns out, he lives off-campus, though not far.

"Which building is yours? McKinley or Irvine?"

"Irvine," I answer, keeping my eyes facing forward.

As he takes me through the empty streets, I'm melancholy and wishing I could do or say something that would make him reveal the truth of him.

Up ahead are several flashing lights. The police cars are blocking the streets. Austin glances at me, his eyes roaming to my bare legs, and I quickly pull down my dress. He comes to a stop, and a police officer walks over. "Hey, Austin," the policeman says. "You'll have to turn around."

"Sure thing, but what happened?" Austin plays it cool. Obviously, these two know each other.

"There's been another murder. The body's been drained, same as the others." He shakes his head. "Damn vampires." The guy adjusts his belt, and his gun flashes in the light. Next to it is a wooden stake. It's the new world order where the police are trained to protect and serve humans and supernaturals. I should probably start carrying mine.

"I know, right?" Austin says, but I sense something is off.

The cop glances in through the window and glances at me. "Miss." Then he walks back toward the crime scene.

Austin doesn't say anything as he turns around and takes side streets. Finally, he stops in front of my building and puts the Jeep in park. "Thanks for hanging out with me last night."

I open the door, forcing myself not to look at him. I'm so torn. I want to smile, tell him I think he's wonderful, and ask if he wants to spend more time together. But my brain won't shut up. Because even if he doesn't know what his father did, even if he's completely innocent, it doesn't change the fact that he is his father's son. I can't forget that. Not to mention I'm eighty percent sure he's a vampire. Did he kill the latest victim while I was sleeping? I also think about my brother. I need to talk to him but I have no idea where he is or how to reach him.

"Sorry I was such an idiot." I step out. "See you in class," I say.

"Not if I see you first." His eyes twinkle, and for a moment, I think of pushing away all of my worries. Vampire or not and whatever his father's sins, Austin is amazing. Instead, I slam the door, frustrated with myself and walk to the entrance of my building without looking back.

OceanofPDF.com

THOROUGHLY TOUSLED

OceanofPDF.com

BEHIND THE MURDERS

WYSTERIA

Since receiving my freedom and my memories returning, I've wondered on more than one occasion what happens after we die.

I'm not ashamed to admit that I hope there is something more. That somehow my murdered parents are out there somewhere.

As I ride up the elevator in Irvine Hall to my floor, I can't help thinking about the latest murder victim and offer a silent plea on their behalf.

Thankfully, this most recent death didn't occur on campus.

Gossip circulates about the dean closing the school.

Selfishly, I don't want that to happen. Even as I think about it, I worry about Sage. I should've asked the policeman if he knew the identity of the dead.

Vampires are behind the murders.

That's what everyone is saying.

I don't doubt it, but why? They're committing an act of terror, as stated in the laws.

The Supernatural Task Force is undoubtedly around.

Which leads me to think about Austin.

Somehow, he's a vampire. I know it, even though I don't know how.

I know he's been changed.

Next chance I get, I'm going to ask Christopher.

At the door to my room, I unlock it cautiously and go inside.

Even though it's four-thirty in the morning, Sage isn't here.

Her bed is an untidy mess of covers, but she isn't amongst them.

On her bedside table is a stone bowl with smoke rising out of it.

I rush over and flinch as the stench hits my nose. It smells horrible. I pick it up and turn in a circle, debating what to do with it. I could dump it down a toilet, but if what's in the bowl is the remnants of a spell, that would be bad.

My training comes back in a whoosh of emotions, and I must sit down.

While other kids went on ski trips or camping trips with their families, I went on outings where I learned how to capture and slay different supernaturals.

As a kid, I found the training fun.

My parents kept it upbeat.

But now, as I watch the blue liquid turn to red and then gray, I know the time for games is over.

But what can I do? And where to start?

If the spell Sage concocted hurts someone, she will be kicked out of school and possibly imprisoned.

My throat constricts, and I glance at the digital clock on my nightstand.

The party can't still be going, and I'm worried.

Sage wrote her cell number on the whiteboard hanging on the door, and I walk to it.

Write the number on my hand and head out, passing the communal bathroom on our floor and reach the common area.

There's a TV hanging on one wall with seating and coffee tables, but no one is out here so early in the morning.

The room is quiet except for the rattling vents.

Sitting near the phone, I dial Sage's number.

It rings several times, and I get her voicemail: "You've reached the voicemail of Sage St. James. I can't talk to you right now because I'm out having fun, which is what you should be doing. So, hang up and go party. Oh, and if you're hard up to leave a message, do it now."

I smile, despite the tension in my body.

When I hear the beep, I say into the phone, "Hey Sage. I'm back in our room, and you aren't here. I'm wondering if you're okay." I pause. "Sorry I left. I won't do it again. Promise." I hang up, frustrated and worried.

Back in our room, I pull off Austin's sweatshirt and toss it on my bed. Carefully I remove Sage's dress and hang it on a hanger. I'm not sure if she'll want to get it cleaned, so I don't put it back in her closet but drape it over the closet door. I set her heels back in their box.

The girl is very organized when it comes to clothes and shoes.

Everything else, not so much.

As I'm putting the shoebox back where I found it, Sage bursts into the room. Her eyes are wild.

I'm in my undies and can't help the screech that escapes my throat. She barely glances at me before falling on the bed.

"Sage." I grab a shirt from a drawer and rush to her bed. "Sage," I say again. "Are you alright?"

She sits up, and I see the rage on her face, feel it radiating off her body, through her pores - like tiny daggers, all aimed at me. "I'm fine," she shouts. "Can't you see I'm fine?"

I flinch. Her breath smells of cigarettes, and she's most definitely not okay. Her tutu is ripped. So are her leggings. Her makeup is streaked like she's been crying.

I don't know what to do, what to say.

Her breathing is ragged, and she sniffles. Tears fall from her eyes and drip down her cheeks.

Like an idiot, I sit there, my hands in my lap, waiting. For what, I'm not sure. But I want her to know I care, that I'm here if she needs me.

Finally, I decide to do what I did last time. I hold out a tissue. She rips it from my hand and wipes her face, blows her nose.

“What happened to you?” Sage asks through gritted teeth.

I tell her about the four shots, about Austin, and him taking me back to his place. As I talk, her eyes get bigger and bigger. And I know what she’s thinking. Exactly what Austin said everyone would.

“Nothing happened, though,” I finish, sitting beside her, tucking my hands between my knees.

“Right,” she says, standing, ripping her clothes from her body like they have been doused in the plague. She then gets into PJ pants and a tee. “Just like nothing happened with me, either.” She giggle-snorts as another sob escapes. “But this time, they’re gonna wish they were never born.”

My pulse quickens. It doesn’t matter whether she believes me about Austin.

“What didn’t happen with you last night?” I ask gently.

Her anger seems to have abated. “Well,” she begins, sitting gingerly. Her eyes are unblinking. “I didn’t end up going back to Doug’s room with him and another guy. We didn’t have sex. I didn’t let them drink from me, and I most certainly didn’t - ” She trails off and blinks back tears.

I’m in shock. Doug gave me the creeps - the way he looked at her and put his hands on me.

“I didn’t. I - ” Sage stops, breaking down, putting her head in my lap. “Wys.” Sobs rack her body.

I’m frozen. Unsure of what to do. How can I comfort her? Clearly, whatever happened, she didn’t want it to. My blood boils.

Doug is a vampire.

“If I ever see Doug again, I’m going to drive a stake through his damned heart,” I hiss and mean it.

Sage snuggles her head against my knee, and I stroke her crazy hair.

“I’m so sorry, Sage. So sorry.”

She sniffles. “I may have broken a rule or two, even a few laws, but trust me when I say Doug and his friend are going to wish for death by stake.” She lets out giggle-sob and wipes her face on her blanket.

“What did you do?” Not that I’m complaining. Whatever she did, I’m sure they deserved it. I just want to know so we can prepare for any consequences or retribution on their part.

She sits up. “Let’s just say their fangs are no longer in their mouths but have been magically relocated to another part of their anatomy.” She crosses her arms.

I feel the question form on my face as I think about where she could’ve put them. “Like on their - ”

“Penises,” she says and snort-laughs.

My hands fly to my mouth as I gasp. “Crap, Sage! Are you serious?” I’m in shock but also think she rocks. “You’re brilliant.”

Sage wipes her nose on her comforter. “Thanks, Wysteria.” With effort, as though she’s in pain, she sits back up. “Now that it’s done and I said what I did out loud, I’m kind of worried, though. Like if they tell and I’m sure they will, I could get into a whole hell of a lot of trouble.”

She’s right. “How can I help?”

Sage picks up the stone bowl, studying the contents. “I don’t know the reversal spell.” She sucks in a breath and starts to cry again. “I drink too much. I like to party. Sometimes I forget guys will take advantage of that. It’s nothing I haven’t been through before, but they freaking deserved what I did to them.” She shrugs. “I’m sure Snow and the supernatural courts won’t see it that way.” She picks at a string on her comforter, pulling and pulling and pulling until finally, it breaks off.

“Sage, you were - ” I pause, not wanting to use the word rape even though that’s exactly what it sounds like. “Human or supernatural, that isn't okay, and they deserve to be punished." Even as I say the words, I know it won't matter. The fact that she broke supernatural laws will trump what they did to her. And that burns me up inside. Rage filters along my veins. Doug and the other guy deserve great suffering.

"Um, Wys, I don't mean to alarm you, but your hair is glowing."

I pull my hair over my shoulder. Sure enough, it is glowing, and that gives me an idea. "I can fix it," I say.

"What?" She looks confused.

"I need to borrow your phone."

Still unsure, she hands over her cell.

I call Christopher. He answers on the first ring, and I tell him what happened. He promises to come over right away. After I hang up, I hand Sage back her phone. "My brother is coming over. He'll help us."

"What can your brother do?" She falls back on her bed, tucking her hair behind her ears and staring up at the ceiling.

"A lot," I say, falling back on the bed beside her.

The murder is forgotten.

Austin's scent is still on my skin, but I push away thoughts of him as well.

Right now, I need to focus on helping Sage.

So I tell her about Christopher.

"He's a vampire?" Fear flickers through her eyes. "My aunt is a vampire, but she's different than those I've met since coming here. I don't like them."

I want to ask her about her aunt, but focus. "He's one of the good guys." I think. I hope. "He's been watching out for me a long time. Plus, he knows lots of people on the council as well as the vampire queen. He'll know what to do."

Sage rolls onto her side, facing me. "My aunt is the vampire queen, but it won't matter. When she and my parents find out what I've done, they won't have a choice. They will have to come down on me with the full extent of the law." A tear trickles down and across her nose, landing on the blankets between us.

I won't let that happen. Sage doesn't deserve anything but kindness. If the vampire queen and her parents can't see that, then to hell with them. "Come on," I say, jumping to my feet.

Her brows crunch together, and she sniffles. "Where are we going?"

"You know where Doug lives? And you know what this other guy looks like?"

"Yes, but - "

"Change into something else. We aren't waiting for Christopher. I'm going to fix this." I go over to my side of the room and tug on a pair of jeans before sliding into a black pair of ballet flats.

I debate on a coat and decide on the black one that used to be my mother's. It's faux leather and cropped and totally cool.

It's the one she wore on all of her Supernatural Task Force missions.

When I was ten and eleven, I sometimes used to sneak and try it on. Then it was too big, but as I slide it on now, I'm filled with nostalgia.

Plus, it fits perfectly.

Like it was made for me.

My backpack is on the floor. I unzip it and retrieve the stake Christopher put in there a while ago. Then tuck the pointy thing down the middle of my back.

When I'm ready, I catch a glimpse of myself in the mirror. I look so much like my mom, it hurts, and my chest tightens.

How I miss her and my dad.

I grab a fat elastic from off my bedside table and wind my hair a dozen times before securing it in a thick bun. “Are you ready?” I ask, turning toward Sage.

She’s dressed but looks freaked. “You are kind of a badass,” she says, giving me a once over. “I love the jacket.”

“Thanks,” I say and walk to the door.

As we ride down the elevator, I catch Sage giving me sideways looks.

“What?” I should be more afraid and not feeling this calmness that’s winding its way through me.

For the first time in months, I feel like I’m in control of my life and not the other way around.

“Are you going to use that thing?” She nods her head toward me, but I know she means the stake. It feels weird and right, pressing against my back. The wood is soft, the pointy end facing up toward my bra strap, the way my parents taught me to carry it.

“Only if I have to,” I say, crossing my arms.

OceanofPDF.com

COMPELLED ME

WYSTERIA

The sun is beginning to rise, but we still have the anonymity of the darkness as we drive in Sage's car through the dead streets of Gothel Springs.

For vampires, sunlight isn't a problem, but according to my training, their weakest time of day is when the sun starts to rise, which means we have an advantage.

"After I take care of this, you have to promise me you'll report what they did to you," I say, studying her profile.

She laughs a harsh dismal laugh. "And tell them what? That I came on to those guys? I asked for it. I thought I wanted them to bite me and other stuff. And then they got rough and mean, so I asked them to stop. They compelled me to keep going the first time and they tried to compel me last night too. Except for this time, I used a spell, so the compulsion wouldn't work. When they realized they couldn't compel me, they got madder and rougher." She shrugs again, closes her eyes, and more tears fall.

"That is against the law. And aside from the supernatural stuff, the other stuff they did is wrong too. No means no," I say, quoting the words my parents told me from a very young age. They wanted me to be a strong, independent woman. They just hadn't planned on dying or me being kidnapped by a crazy old bat.

"You're sweet and naïve," she says and turns onto a street I recognize.

I agree and hold my breath as she heads toward Austin's apartment complex. "What are we doing here?" I eke out, trying to keep calm. Austin couldn't have been one of the vampires who compelled her but Sage has driven us to his apartment complex.

“Doug lives in one of the bottom floor apartments,” she says, pointing at the building.

Relief washes over me. At the same time, I wonder if the complex is like a vampire coven or hang out or something.

Sage parks and faces me. “Thank you for suggesting I report them. That means a lot, but if there’s one thing I know for sure, it’s what they will say to me after I give them my statement.”

“What’s that?” I ask softly.

“They will tell me to stop drinking, to stop putting myself in sketchy situations. They’ll look at me and blame me. And then they won’t do anything about it. Not even the fact that those supernatural jerks compelled me will matter. In this town, supernaturals rule over everyone.” She puts her hands in her lap and studies them.

As much as Sage dresses and acts like she’s confident, at this moment, I can tell she’s harboring a lot of insecurities.

A rush of protectiveness wells up inside me. Like Austin, she is part of my family, and I’ll do anything to protect her. “What about your parents?” I say. “I mean, your dad is an angel, right?”

“I don’t want to talk about my parents,” she says, turning away, looking out the window on her side.

I’m about to try again, but she interrupts, glancing back at me, her eyes hard once again.

“What’s your plan?” she asks, point-blank. “You evidently have some sort of magic. Why don’t you tell me how you’re going to fix this.” She’s equal parts irritated and intrigued. That much is clear. But how much to tell her at this moment?

I touch my bun. “My hair glows blue because I do have magic. It comes from unicorns and elves and - ” I’m about to tell her I’m the fountain of youth, but someone exits one of the downstairs apartments.

At the same time, Sage sucks in her breath. “That’s the other one.”

Her face pales, and her eyes widen. She's afraid. Not that I blame her.

"Okay. Stay here." I open the door and get out, keeping my eyes locked on the guy. He's preoccupied, his phone in one hand, and the other is cupping his junk. I know why and have to force myself not to laugh.

Sage put his fangs on his penis. I mean, it's brilliant.

"Hey," I say, feeling braver than I have in years as I stride toward him.

He looks up. "Do I know you?" He looks freaked and slightly chaotic. If I suddenly had fangs on my private parts, I'd probably behave the same way.

"You were at the Heaven or Hell party last night, right?" I pull my hair from its elastic, letting it fall as I tilt my head back.

He notices and smiles. "Yeah, I was there. Too bad we didn't get to party. You're divine." He takes a deep breath through his nose. "And you smell mouthwatering." He opens his mouth, I'm guessing, to flash his fangs, but there's only gaping holes where they should be.

"Thanks," I say, fighting the need to puke as I pull my hair around to the front and wrap the ends around my hand.

"What are you doing here?" His eyes fall to my hand, and he tilts his head in question.

"I have a friend who lives in this building." I shrug, trying to act nonchalant as I reach out and take his hand in mine, knowing I'm going to have to wash it and my hair really good after this, but it has to be done.

As soon as my hair touches him, it begins to glow. He tries to pull away, but I hang on. "Let's party now," I say, trying to distract him by batting my eyelashes.

"Aren't you flirty," he says but is preoccupied with what I'm doing. "You seem to be having a problem with your hair. It's, well it's blue."

"It does that sometimes," I respond, trying to act casual, but I feel the spell Sage cast over him reversing.

His eyes flash with surprise. After putting away his phone, his free hand goes up to his mouth, touching the fangs that are back in his mouth. Then he grabs himself and makes a face, one that can only be described as a relief. “Did you do that?”

I nod, glad he’s healed and whole once again, for Sage’s sake. “Think of this as a one-time gift,” I say, removing my hand and pulling the stake from my waistband, aiming it at him. “But, if you ever go near my friend, Sage again, I’ll kill you. Do you hear me?”

The vampire freaking smirks, stepping right into my stake. “I’d like to see you try, glow stick. That’s quite a trick you performed. How does your magic work?”

I swallow. My plan was to reverse the spell and heal him, but I didn’t think beyond that. “Just get away from me.” I shove him with the pointy end.

He steps back, his eyes narrowed. “You better watch yourself.” He flashes his fangs.

I force myself not to flinch and try to make myself taller. He can’t kill me. At least, I don’t think so, but he might be able to compel me and then do to me what he did to Sage.

He grabs me by my arms. “Let’s have a little fun, shall we? Look into my eyes,” he commands.

I don’t, keeping my eyes on his chest as I try to pull away from him. But he’s so strong.

He grips my face in one hand, forcing my chin up. “Come on. I want you to use that stake on Sage,” he says.

I try to shake my head, closing my eyes. “Let go of me,” I whisper harshly and jab the stake into his neck deftly before pulling back, ready to stab him again.

He squeals like a pig, releasing me.

I open my eyes, catching myself before I fall back.

He's pressing a hand to his neck. Blood gushes out, pumping through his fingers and down his hand and arm. "You bitch," he seethes.

The wound won't kill him, but hopefully, it hurts like hell.

"Wysteria?"

A quick glance around the bleeding vampire reveals Austin is on his balcony, staring down at us.

"Saved by the pretty boy, but there will definitely be a next time." The guy takes off using his vampire speed and is gone.

Austin jogs down the steps and comes straight for me. "What the hell?"

"Hi," I say, wiping the bloody stake on my jeans before tucking it back into my pants. My parents used to have holsters they kept under their jackets.

"Hi?" he asks, his face a mask of fury. "What was that all about?"

"Nothing," I say, but realize if I'm going to fix Doug too, I need his help. "Okay, that's not true. Did you know Doug is a vampire?"

"You live here too?" Sage asks before Austin can answer.

I'd momentarily forgotten about her.

She's out of her car, her hands on her hips, a shocked expression twisting her face.

"Yep," Austin says, glancing from me to Sage before landing back on me. "Which one of you wants to enlighten me?"

"I was about to," I say, looking at Sage.

Her face falls, and she glares. "I'm out of here." She climbs back into her car and takes off, leaving me without a ride home. Not that I blame her. It's twice now that I left her.

"Great." I will have some serious explaining to do when I return to our room, but I still have a job to finish here.

Doug needs his fangs put back in his mouth.

“Wys?” Austin asks.

“Doug is a vampire, and so are you, right?”

Austin’s lips pinch together. “What did he do?” He doesn’t answer my question.

“He and that guy who just ran away hurt Sage. They compelled her and used her.”

As I speak, Austin’s face gets more and more furious, but he doesn’t say anything, and I go on.

“Last night, she did a spell, and they ended up with their fangs removed from their mouths and attached - ” I don’t finish but point to his pants.

He looks down. Then starts to laugh, a deep guttural laugh. “You’re kidding?” he asks.

“Nope. If you ask me, that was well deserved. But since she doesn’t want to go to jail or worse, I told her I would heal them by reversing the spell.” I expect him to ask me how I will do that, but he doesn’t. He just nods.

“The guy you were talking to, the one you stabbed in the neck, that’s Gary. You healed him already?”

I nod, wondering just how much he knows about me. “Yes, but I still need to do the same to Doug. Can you help me get inside his apartment?”

“Hell, yes.” His eyes twinkle, and he heads back over to the complex.

At the door, as he’s about to knock, I take his fist in both my hands. “You are a vampire, right?” If he isn’t, I don’t want him to go inside. Because Doug is, and that would make him stronger than Austin. Sure, Austin has elf blood in him, which gives him some sight, but that’s nothing compared to all a vampire possesses. I refuse to let him get hurt.

He cups my face in his hands. “Are you worried about me, Wysteria Hart?"

My heart is racing at his nearness, and my gaze drops to his luscious lips. "Yes," I say.

"That's what I thought." He kisses me swiftly, then bangs on the door.

"You are, aren't you?" I ask again, breathless, needing to hear the truth from him.

The door flings open, and before I can get a grasp of what's happening, Austin shoves Doug inside and has him on the floor in a chokehold. "Do your thing, Wysteria."

Jumping into action, I run over to Doug, who is swearing and struggling, and let my hair drape against his bare arm. My magic flares to life.

Doug quiets, and his eyes widen with fear.

Austin is looking at me with fascinated wonder.

I can feel the spell reversing and Doug healing. When it's done, I pull the stake from my waistband and stick it to his throat.

Doug starts to writhe again, fighting to get out of Austin's hold, but he has a tight grip.

"I healed you for Sage's sake, but if you ever go near her again, I'll shove this stake into your chest," I say.

I may not be an official member of the Supernatural Task Force. I may not be sanctioned for such a threat, but I don't care. What he and Gary did deserves punishment.

"And if she doesn't, then I will," Austin hisses. "With pleasure." He releases Doug and stands, pulling me up with him, and more rapidly than I can blink, we're out of Doug's apartment and whooshing across the landscape like someone pressed fast forward. In seconds, we are in the alley behind my building on campus.

My breath is coming in rapid bursts as my feelings swirl all over the place. "I knew it," I say. There aren't any people around, but I tuck the stake away and then look up at Austin.

His face is a muddled mess of emotions. “I am,” he grits out. “But no one is supposed to know. Swear you won’t tell anyone, not even Sage.”

I search his eyes, desperate to know how such a thing happened.

Who changed him?

There’s also Doug. Austin wrestled him and used his vampire speed. He knows Austin is a vampire now too.

Before I can ask any of the sixty-five questions swirling in my brain, he leans down and kisses me.

At first, it’s soft, but then he presses my mouth open, diving in with his tongue, and I’m lost in him, wrapping my arms around his neck.

I kiss him back, my body on fire with need for this man who used to be the boy I had a crush on. This man who used to be part elf but is now all vampire.

This man who is the son of the man who killed my parents.

But none of that matters.

Because the man holding me and kissing me is all I’ve ever wanted, and I hope he never lets me go.

Sadly, my hope is dashed to pieces when someone whistles and asks if she can join in.

“I’ll call you later,” Austin says, touching my swollen bottom lip with his thumb.

“My phone, remember. It’s broken.”

“We’ll see about that,” he says. “Later.”

I watch him walk away, waiting for my thighs to stop shaking.

With my elastic, I wind my hair back up into a bun before starting around to the front and the entrance so I can go up to my room.

As soon as I close my bedroom door, my eyes flick to Sage. She’s sitting on the edge of her bed, rocking back and forth.

"I'm sorry, Sage," I whisper. "I promise to be a better friend, and I swear never to leave you alone at a party again."

She falls back, her head smacking the pillow. "Don't get all Mother Theresa on me. What happened isn't your fault." She throws her arm over her eyes and sniffles. "Did you fix Doug or stake him like you did the other guy?"

I press my head against her pillow, so our heads are touching. "Yeah, both jerks are physically back to the way they were before your spell, and I didn't stake him."

"So, they're both still alive?" She sounds disappointed.

"Sadly," I say.

She sighs heavily. "Thanks, Wysteria. Really. You're a good friend." Her voice is quiet, and I look over at her. "I'm beat, but let's talk later. I want to know all about your magic hair."

I snort. "You got it." I climb off the bed, tuck the stake back in my backpack, change my clothes, and leave.

The piano rooms open at five. And I need to play.

Play until my fingers are raw.

Until I can't see Sage's devastated face, or Doug, and the way he looked at her.

I need to play until I can't see the blood, so much blood, and the way my parents were lying still, so still on the carpet. I have to play until I can't see the smug smile on Austin's dad's face.

I need to play until the pain stops, and all I feel is the music and the keys.

The staccato and legato.

Until all of my frenzied anxieties disappear, and there's only the music.

OceanofPDF.com

SLAYER TYPE

WYSTERIA

When preparing for college, there's never a mention of its dark underbelly.

Talk is always about the classes, finding a major, living on your own, social clubs, and getting a degree.

They don't say anything about the parties and the drinking.

They leave out the way our bodies thrum for more than books, studying, and tests. They don't tell us what happens at night when classes end, and the real learning begins. The difficult decisions that can affect the rest of our lives.

"There's another party tonight," Sage says, half-heartedly. She's lying on her bed on her stomach, her Psychology book propped open.

I'm not sure if she's reading it or perusing through the pictures. Psychology is her major, which I find slightly hilarious.

"Want to go? I'm sure Austin will be there."

At the thought of him, my heart lurches. He helped me with Doug, kissed me, and flat out told me he's a vampire. He and I have a lot to talk about.

I glance up from the Sudoku puzzle I'm working on.

Sage is smirking like she knows what's going on inside my head.

"Aren't you worried about those guys?" I ask carefully.

"Nope, this time I'm prepared." She shows me she also has a stake.

"Where did you get that?"

"I made it," she admits. "I also added a little something-something extra to it." She wiggles her nose and waves her fingers.

A sparkle of magic swirls above them.

It's then I realize just how powerful her magic must be.

She really isn't living up to her potential.

But I don't say that.

"I have that paper due in English. I was going to work on it. Plus, I need to do laundry. I should probably - "

She holds up a hand. "Yeah, me either," she says, snickering.

I let my composure falter and release a giant sigh. "Good."

Sage looks better. Seems a little better, too. She's showered. Wearing cutoffs and a white tank, but I've no clue what's going on under all of that blond hair.

"Want to do laundry together?" I ask, false hope in my voice.

Neither of us has been to the basement laundry room since our Resident Assistant gave us the tour.

She taps a finger to her lip and looks at the ceiling as though debating the mysteries of the universe. Finally, she says, "It's an exciting prospect. But no. I can clean my clothes with a spell so I'll pass. Have fun, though."

I laugh, wishing I knew a spell to do my laundry. "I will."

She flips on her music but keeps it down, and I go back to working on my puzzle. "Where did you get your stake, and how did you know how to use it?"

"Huh?" I raise my head, feigning innocence, though there's no point. Of course, I should've known those questions were coming.

"Don't play coy. You could've killed that vampire." She turns down her music. "You keep surprising me. I didn't peg you for the slayer type." Her face is lifted, waiting for me to answer, but I'm caught off guard.

I've thought about telling her, but the timing's been off. And now? She's dealing with so much. How can I further weigh her down with my problems? If I tell her how I know what I know, I'll also have to tell her about my parents.

Sage closes her book and climbs off her bed. “Talk to me.”

My heart starts to race, and I press my arms to my sides. She’s standing in front of me, her arms crossed, interest on her face. But I’m not ready to talk about my parents. Not yet.

I shake my head. “I’d rather not talk about it right now.”

She spins around and throws herself back on her bed. “I spilled my guts to you this morning. Told you private stuff, and you can’t even tell me how the hell you know how to use a stake. Lame.” She flips open her book, whipping the pages so hard I think she’ll rip them.

“It isn’t that I don’t want to tell. I do. It’s just kind of heavy.” My insides are quivering just thinking about talking to her about them.

“Yeah, whatever. You’re a tragic soul. Your life is hard. Blah. Blah. Blah. And boo-hoo.” Sage stops flipping pages and glares. “You’re nothing special, you know. Whatever problems you think you have, someone else always has worse.” She slams her book shut, slides on a pair of black combat boots. “I’m out of here.” She flings open the door.

A guy is standing at the opening, his hand raised to knock.

“Hey.” He waves nervously.

“What do you want?” Sage asks in a huff.

“Is - ” he pauses and looks at the card. “Wysteria Hart here?”

I notice he’s holding something in his hands, like a present. I climb off the bed.

“I’m Wysteria,” I say, curious.

“Of course, it’s for you. The virgin magical-hair girl.” She shoves past the guy, knocking him out of the way.

I’m sad she’s upset with me but focus on the guy, instantly leery of him. Christopher said people are after me. And even though I have a cloaking spell over me, that won’t stop everyone. Not only that, but it wouldn’t be hard for the vampires I threatened to find out where I live. “Who’s it from?” I ask cautiously.

The friendly smile he wore moments ago vanishes. “Look, I have no clue. Do you want this or not?” He holds out the bag like it contains poison.

“Yeah, okay.” I take the card and the pink gift bag.

The guy walks away, shaking his head. “Stupid Freshmen.”

“Thanks,” I holler after him.

He raises a hand but keeps walking.

I close the door and sit on my bed. The card has my name on the outside. Inside are two words: Call me.

Underneath is a phone number.

I know that phone number.

I’ve got it memorized.

Nervous butterflies flutter in my belly, not because this is from some scary supernatural, but because this is from Austin. I set the card on the bed, push aside the tissue, and look inside the bag.

It’s a cell phone.

I can’t believe he bought me a new one. That’s thoughtful. I pull the phone out.

It’s one of those prepaid ones.

Opening the instructions, I figure out how to turn it on and then find out how many minutes I have. It says 5000, and that they can be used for texting.

A rush of excitement shivers down my spine.

I’m still new to the whole cell phone craze with the music and the internet and the gazillion social media sites and dating apps.

This one isn’t fancy. It doesn’t even look like it can play music, but still. He bought me a phone.

Sweet!

I study the card again. The phone pings in my hand, and I jump.

A message pops on the screen: Wys, call me!

I stare at the words on the screen and know they're from Austin. My heartbeat picks up speed. I try not to be too eager, but I can't help it. I stare at the message wondering how to respond.

Should I call or play dumb?

I decide on the latter, just for fun.

I text back: Who is this?

Pushing the gift bag off my lap, I lean against my pillows, crossing one leg over the other.

Several seconds pass, and I start to wonder if he's going to respond.

I try to relax and focus on my Sudoku, but the numbers on the page are a blur.

I think about Sage and the way she huffed out of the room.

Sitting up, I punch her number into my phone and type a message.

I text: Sorry, Sage. I want to tell you all about my life. I don't know what happened earlier, except I was in shock you brought it up all of a sudden. Hope you're okay. By the way, this is Wysteria, and I have a new cell phone.

She texts back: Who gave you a phone?

I pause, debating whether I should tell her. Then type: Austin.

She responds: Are you still a virgin?

I snort. Heat blooms through my whole body. Why would she ask me that? What does my still being a virgin have to do with Austin giving me a phone? Unless -

"Ugh," I shout at the ceiling. "I'm not easy."

I text my answer quickly: Yes, I'm still a virgin! You've been gone five minutes.

Sage answers in a flash: Nothing magically kinky going on?

I respond: No!

Sage texts back: Would you tell me if you and Austin did get kinky?

The woman is wild. I say back. No handcuffs or whips were involved.

She texts back: Handcuffs and whips? I didn't think you were that kind of girl, but I guess we can work something out, if you'd like.

"What?" I sit up. Reread her message, and start to text back when I see the name at the top of the text. It didn't go to Sage.

It went to Austin.

“Frack!” I toss my phone away as though it’s a red-hot coal.

I bury my face in my pillow and scream with humiliation. I’ve done plenty of embarrassing things. Like the time the heel of my shoe caught on the hem of my skirt when I stood after playing my song at a piano recital when I was ten. That’s why I wear ballet flats now. No heels to worry about.

Or the time I went down a slide at the waterpark and my top came off, which is why I no longer wear bikinis.

And there are more, many, many more.

But in all those times, in all those places, never have I been more mortified than I am right now.

My phone is at the foot of my bed, and I hear it ping. I sit, desperate to know what it says, but at the same time, I’m terrified.

I chant over and over in my mind: I don't care what he thinks. I don't care what he thinks.

But I do care. A lot.

At that moment, I think of my parents.

What would they think of me being with Austin? Am I honoring them with my feelings for a murderer’s son? Ugh, I need to stop dwelling on that.

Another ping. I can’t resist.

Ever so slowly, I pick up the phone, turn it over and read the text.

It’s from Sage: No response :(Does that mean you're doing the deed now?

I hurry and text her back: Texting shame. I sent the message meant for you to someone else. The words handcuffs and whips were included.

Sage messages back: OMG. Who?

I type out: Austin.

She responds: LOLOLOLOLOLOLOL

I can’t answer that.

Sage is laughing at me - in writing.

I’m sure that’s what Austin is doing too. My face blisters hot.

Austin texts: Wysteria, why won't you call?

I send back: Why don't you call me?

I would call him, but the idea of dialing the numbers, forcing myself to recognize the truth. I want to talk to him. Each digit bringing me closer to the inevitable. I’m not brave enough to do it. But if he calls, then all I have to do is answer. Or ignore it.

Austin texts: Fine. I will.

The phone rings. The ringtone is a lovely minuet. I stare at the screen, recognizing the number.

It’s Austin.

Before I answer, Sage pushes open the door. I click ignore and stuff the phone under my leg. “Hey.”

“Hey yourself.” She’s fidgety and seems a little out of it. "Austin isn't here. I half thought he would be." She kicks off her shoes.

"Nope. Still a virgin. Nothing kinky," I say, hoping to make her laugh.

She sniffles and rewards me with a strange smile.

“So, you wanna talk?” I ask, patting the spot next to me on my bed. Austin will have to wait. It's time Sage and I have a heart to heart.

She shrugs. “It’s okay. I thought I might go to the party tonight after all. I need to get out.”

My heart drops into my stomach. “Really?”

Sage laughs. “No, not really. I just wanted to see the look on your face.” She throws herself onto my bed. “Tell me everything.”

OceanofPDF.com

ROOMMATE CHAT

WYSTERIA

Sage and I talk and talk and talk. I do tell her everything.

About Christopher.

Austin.

What I saw his dad do to my parents.

Training for the Supernatural Task Force before I was taken.

I tell her about being a prisoner in another realm.

I even tell her I'm the fountain of youth.

She takes the over-abundance of information surprisingly well.

Until recently, I believed myself an only child. Now I have Christopher, but I always wanted a sister.

Sage has taken the role.

It only took eighteen years, but she's worth the wait.

I can't help but think of those cackling senior girls that put us together.

Maybe they are smarter than I gave them credit for.

Sage shares more about her life and her parents. Even though she was born in the realm of Polonias, she was mostly raised in Sharra.

The Vampire Queen is her aunt.

Her grandfather is the legendary dragon, Abernathy.

I'm in awe of her as she talks about attending the Seven Magics Academy and what it was like to live, breathe, and be magic twenty-four-seven during the first eighteen years of her life.

If I heard about her without knowing her, I would've believed her life was perfect. Yet, it wasn't. She was racked with weaknesses and struggles the same as me.

“The problem is,” Sage went on, interrupting my thoughts.

“With my ancestry comes a lot of expectation. If I make a mistake, it’s like the end of the world to my parents. They are beyond suffocating.” She shrugs. “So, of course, I chose to rebel and do everything I can to help them see I’m not and never will be their perfect daughter because perfection is a myth, you know?”

“Do they know you’re here?” We’re sitting cross-legged on my bed and have been for so long, my legs are asleep, but I can’t move, too captivated with Sage’s life.

It’s so different than mine.

While I was sitting in my tower, teaching myself to play piano, she learned spells, tried magically infused drugs, and drank alcohol laced with enchantments.

And guys, galore!

Some of her stories make my toes curl.

Like the time she and a gargoyle went into the orchard to hook up. While they were there, trolls appeared. They were trying to sneak up on the castle, determined to invade Sharra, and take it for themselves.

Sage and the guy ran back to the school ahead of the trolls to wake the headmistress, but she, Sage’s parents, and Snow already knew the trolls were coming. Sage got into a lot of trouble for that one.

In Sharra, being outside after curfew is grounds for severe punishment.

“Yeah, they know. We came to a compromise,” Sage says, making a face.

I nod, taking her hand. “You’re right. Perfection is a myth.” My feet are tingling, but I don’t worry about them.

Sage’s life is better than any show I watched as a kid.

When I was young, my parents and I were a team.

Team Slayer, we called ourselves.

Of course, I made the name up when I was five. But it stuck.

When my parents were around, we did everything together.

The worst thing I ever did was sneak out. One time. That offense cost my parents their lives and seven years of mine. I don't share that information or that I feel responsible for them dying. Because it seems like Sage has a lot to get off her chest, and I can tell she needs to vent.

"In the end, all I did was disappoint Cindy and Gabe." She flops back on the bed and covers her face with a pillow.

I'm surprised by her mother's name. I don't know why. I think she told me their names when we first met, but they sink in this time. "It was your mom who put the cloaking spell on me to keep me safe," I say cautiously.

I met the witch, and she seemed really nice.

Now that I think about it, I can totally see her mother in my friend's face.

Sage is a little rougher around the edges while Cindy is the epitome of flawless, but the bone structure, hair color, and look of her and Sage are the same.

Sage removes the pillow and shrugs like I just told her it's raining outside. "I wouldn't be surprised. According to Cindy - Mom, she had a crush on Christopher in high school before falling for my dad. Apparently, your brother betrayed Snow White and chose the wicked vampire queen. For his loyalty, instead of providing him with the power he craved, Sharra tried to kill him."

"Are you serious?" I don't want to believe it. Sage knows more about Chris than I do. Not that it's hard.

I really don't know anything about him, except he's a vampire and he wants to keep me safe.

"Damn straight." She throws her legs over the side of the bed and sits.

"Tell me everything you know about him." I readjust, unable to ignore the pins and needles any longer.

She tells me how Christopher used to be a Hunter for the previous Vampire Queen. That her name was Sharra, same as the realm, and that she was horrible. Like, desperate to rule all the realms, wicked.

Christopher was on orders from the queen to bring Snow to her. He did. The old Vampire Queen and Snow fought, and Snow won.

After the fight, Snow couldn't let Christopher die and revived him before banning him from the realm.

Years later, when Snow and Dorian's daughter Jasmine became a teen, Christopher helped her defeat Sharra again and the Darkness.

That I knew about. The Darkness was a big deal and something we were taught in school. I was also taught about how Snow White became the supernatural ambassador between realms, including the human one, and that she helped establish laws we still live by today, including the Supernatural Task Force.

But my brother's connection to everything? This is big news. He has a past. One that's fascinating and somewhat shady.

Is it possible he's the vampire draining and killing people? I hope not.

IT'S MIDNIGHT, and Sage is lying next to me on my bed.

Austin's called two more times, but I keep ignoring him. Not because I don't want to talk to him, I do, but the conversation between Sage and me is a crucial moment in our friendship. Not only that, but listening to Sage brings up feeling about Austin's father. About how my parents died.

There is so much about the last seven years of Austin's life I don't know about. I open up and share some of my anxieties with Sage.

What kind of person is he really? Sure, he took care of me one night and didn't try anything.

But the word is, he gets around. Those things have me nervous.

What if I don't know him at all?

I completely trusted Redyrin. I believed her when she told me she was my mother. I believed her when she said I was safer in my towering prison. And look where that got me? I'd even abandoned my best friend, Leva.

I felt horrible about that.

"Why are you blaming Austin for something his father did?" Sage blurts, crossing her arms in frustration.

It's a solid question. I know I shouldn't.

Austin didn't take my parents from me.

My mom and dad actually liked Austin. My mom teased me about him all the time. But I'm scared he'll hurt me the way his father did.

"Wysteria?" Sage touches my arm.

"I don't blame Austin. I don't." I shake my head, realizing I mean it. "But when I see him, or I'm near him, I remember what his father did to my parents. And if his father could do such things, then - " I don't finish the sentence.

I am a product of my parents.

What if Austin is too?

Even as I think such things, my body objects, my heart aching like I've put my own stake through it.

"You think Austin is evil too." Sage takes a deep breath and shakes her head. "I get that. I do." She sniffs. "But, you should give Austin a chance, especially if you feel so strongly about him." She rolls on her side, faces me. Her eyes are the color of dark chocolate, and they're staring at me intently.

I want to let it all go. Just wish it all away. But I can't. I'm not made that way. "I-I don't know if that's possible. Alcohol helps." I take a deep breath, feeling ashamed for stating the fact so bluntly. Although after the last time, I don't want to drink again.

Sage busts out, laughing. "Yeah, it does. If only it didn't have those nasty morning-after side effects."

"We should come up with something. A spell. We'd be world heroes." I laugh with her, grateful our conversation shifted away from Austin.

Sage leans over and kisses my cheek. "Thanks for the chat." She climbs off my bed and falls onto hers. "I'm sleeping straight through tomorrow. Wake me for class on Monday."

"Night, Sage," I say, but there's still something on my mind. Debating for several minutes, I finally say, "Maybe you should give your parents a chance too."

Sage doesn't answer, and her breathing evens out, and I know she's asleep. It doesn't come as quickly for me. I can't help thinking about Austin and my apprehensions.

Without debating the consequences, I pick up my new phone.

Type out this text: Sorry I didn't pick up when you called. Roommate and I were talking. Thanks for the phone. You're very thoughtful and beyond generous. I owe you.

I stare at the screen for several minutes, waiting for him to respond.

He doesn't, and I roll on my side, pull my comforter up to my neck, and close my eyes.

I've been asleep either thirty seconds or three hours when my new phone pings.

Austin's response reads: You're welcome.

OceanofPDF.com

IT'S YOU

WYSTERIA

Thanks to Austin and my new phone, I intended to call Christopher the next day. He's been around. Austin told me as much. But I haven't seen him and I'm nervous about speaking with him.

My brother is so much more than my sibling and my protector.

And I'm not sure how to talk to him or what to say.

So, I keep putting it off, and it's been a week.

Not only that, but I'm nervous about meeting the other half of my piano duet.

Professor Jenkins told me to meet my partner in Piano Room 3. I've been to that room several times already. Professor Jenkins teaches his private lessons in that room, so I'm familiar, but I'm also feeling queasy.

I have no idea who my partner is. What if she's horrible and doesn't like to practice? What if she's hard to work with and we don't get along?

I enter the Fine Arts building, walk downstairs, and open the heavy door leading to the practice rooms. I can't help the intense sigh of relief that enters and exits my lungs.

I imagine this is what religious people get from church.

Music is calming. Fortifying.

And I offer a silent prayer: Please let this duet work out.

There's still five minutes until our meeting time, so I walk slowly, enjoying the muffled sounds of song filling the hallway.

As I get closer to the designated room, a strain of music rises above the others. It's heartbreaking, full of longing, sadness, and hope.

I stop and listen, unable to move.

It's beyond beautiful. I have to see who's playing. My heart demands it.

I run to the door and peer through the small rectangular window.

My body registers his identity before my mind does, and my mouth falls open.

New sets of butterflies have hatched inside my stomach, fluttering around wildly.

Never in my wildest dreams did I think he played the piano or even liked classical music.

But he's always liked poetry, I think, watching him through the small window in the door.

The music stops, and he looks up like he hears me.

He probably did. He is a vampire.

Surprise creases his brow, and he gives me a thigh-shaking smile.

"It's you," I say, unable to stop the grin that blooms across my face.

He gets up from the piano and approaches me. It looks like he hasn't shaved, leaving his face scruffy.

Sexy, I think.

He's wearing faded jeans and a black button-up shirt, the sleeves rolled to his biceps.

I drink him in. The man takes my breath away.

"It's me," he says, opening the door and letting me in.

I'm suddenly beyond nervous at his nearness and lick my lips.

He picks up one of my hands and caresses my palm.

The butterflies in my stomach are frantic, and my heart is racing, racing, racing. So fast, I think it might burst through my chest. "I didn't know you played." The words stumble out of my mouth like drunken old men.

“This must mean you’re my duet partner?” His caressing fingers have moved up to my inner wrist, and my heart stops. Slams to a standstill.

“The duet?” I ask, clearing my throat. Never in a million years would I have guessed Austin could be my partner.

He chuckles. “You are here so we can practice our duet together?” His eyes roam my face like he’s searching for the girl who used to take care of him after his dad would beat him.

I’m here even though I’ve changed since then.

I was eleven. Short. Golden curls. Chunky. Full of wonder and ideas. Always quick to laugh. Always quick to share. I’m no longer that girl. My face and body have become lean. My hair is extra-long, and I don’t laugh nearly so often as I used to.

“It’s good to see you. How’s your phone working out?” Austin asks, his gaze landing on my lips.

That’s when I remember his parents are dead too. At that, my heart softens.

His dad may have been a murdering jerk, but Austin can’t be.

“Good. Great. I really appreciate it.” I look down at our hands. “I - I’m sorry,” I say, meeting his eyes then.

He steps closer, pulling my body to his. I press my face against his chest, breathing in the scent of fresh laundry and vanilla. He’s tangible, real. And I don’t ever want to let him go.

“Sorry, I was a jerk with those girls before. Sometimes I let my damn pride get in the way.”

“Are you still dating them?” My face warms at the question. Why wouldn’t he be? It’s not like I’ve given him any reason not to.

“A few times,” he says. “But - ”

The revelation is a surprise. I shouldn’t be upset, but anger springs to the surface. Or maybe it’s jealousy.

“Why would you do that?” I push away, part of me thinking I should just leave and tell the Professor, never mind.

My thinking is nuts, I know that.

We are barely more than kissing buddies.

“Hey,” Austin says, coming toward me. “I did it because I was scared, too.” He pauses. “I’m in love with you, and that’s effing nuts.” He runs his hands through his hair, turning away. “I mean, before a few weeks ago, we hadn’t seen each other in years.”

He bends down, trying to see my face. “But it’s the truth, and I didn’t want to believe it. The worst part about it is I knew you would find out I’m a vampire, and I didn’t know what you’d think of me. But, Wys, I’ve missed you and want to be with you all the time.”

I shiver. I can’t help it. Austin is saying things I only ever dreamed of hearing. Bearing his soul, speaking truths I haven’t told anyone, not even myself.

“I-I’ve missed you too, Austin.” I want to tell him I love him too, but the words won’t form on my lips.

The door thumps open, and Professor Jenkins walks in. He clears his throat, scrunching his salt and pepper brows. Then he clears his throat again. “I see you two have met. Excellent. Excellent. Sorry, I’m late.”

He pulls some music from his briefcase and hands pages to each of us. “Have a seat, and let’s go over the piece I’d like you both to play.”

Austin winks and sits at the piano he was playing moments before.

I take the one across from him.

The piece of music is kind of a letdown. Sonata in F Major, K. 533/494: III. Rondo. Allegretto. Written by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. Arranged for two pianos by Grieg.

“Let’s take a look at the first page. You’ll see the title and arrangement. I assume you’re both familiar with it?” Professor Jenkins asks.

“Yes,” Austin says.

Professor Jenkins glances at me.

“I am.”

“Excellent. Let’s run through it once.”

Austin shrugs a shoulder and grins. His face is easy to read. It’s saying, I’m game if you are.

I can’t help but meet his grin with one of my own.

Game on, I think.

Austin and I play through the piece for Professor Jenkins several times. We sound fantastic together.

Still, the Professor gives us pointers, advising us on the more difficult sections.

In the first run-through, Austin plays piano one, and I play piano two.

Then we swap.

Piano one is my favorite. The music is so fast my fingers almost have to float above the keys.

But Professor Jenkins ends up giving Austin piano one.

I’m bummed, but I keep telling myself it doesn’t matter.

Playing with Austin at the Winter Gala is almost a guarantee I’ll receive another year of scholarships. At least that’s what Professor Jenkins told me. I focus on that, not my pride.

“Alright, you two. That’s a good start.” Professor Jenkins nods at each of us and he stands.

“Get in plenty of practice. Let’s meet back here. Same time. Same place. Next week. I expect to hear great progress from both of you.” He grabs his briefcase, and walks to the door. “I think the two of you make a great duo.”

“Thanks, Professor,” Austin and I say together as he leaves.

Once the door clicks closed, I turn to Austin. He’s watching me while he plays, and music fills the room. It’s the same piece I heard him play earlier.

“I wrote this for - ” He pauses, clears his throat, and looks down at his hands.

I stand beside him, waiting for him to go on.

Now that he’s bared his soul, we can really talk.

“Who?” I ask.

He doesn’t answer but keeps playing.

I listen, loving the way the top and bottom notes blend together so beautifully, almost like magic.

“So, seven years?” he says but continues to play. “What have you been up to? Besides becoming an amazing pianist.” His brilliant blue eyes find mine. “Never would’ve guessed.” His eyes shift back to the piano keys. “I thought you wanted to be a doctor.”

I can’t help the laugh that leaves my throat. Nor can I help my need to be closer to him.

“Have a seat.” He scoots over on the bench so I can sit beside him.

I slide in, placing my hands in my lap. My heart is my throat. So many questions, thoughts, worries, and desires. They fill me up so I can barely think.

He glances at my lap and smirks. “You’ve got a doctor’s hands.”

I lace my fingers together, letting his words sink in. “I wanted to be a doctor before,” I say, not sure how much to share about my time in my tower. “But while I was in that other realm, I had no memory of my life, this life.” That’s the saddest part. So much time lost.

“I’m sorry,” he says. “That must be difficult. Like you’re almost two different people.” He stops playing and turns to me. “What dreams did you have while you were there?”

His question is unexpected, and my answer will be a letdown. “I used to dream about finding someone and falling in love,” I say, embarrassed. Most of the books I read in the tower were about being whisked away from a mundane life and toward love.

“That sounds so unlike you,” he says.

Now that I have my memories of before my time with Redyrin, I know he’s right.

Mom and Dad taught me to be a strong, independent woman.

They trained me to be like them, promising I could do anything.

Gender had nothing to do with my dreams.

“All I knew was what Redyrin shared with me,” I say. “And that wasn’t much.”

“Now that you’re back?” he goes on, playing Chopsticks.

I join in, almost without thinking. “I guess I want to be like my parents and work for the Supernatural Task Force.”

He stops, his fingers pressing down the keys. “Really?”

“I mean, yeah. Since I’ve been back, that path has kind of called to me.” I stop playing too. “But the piano saved my life. I won’t ever give it up.”

He nods as though he understands. “I get that.”

“Is music your major?” It feels so weird to be having a regular conversation. Me the fountain of youth and him an unsanctioned vampire.

“No, my father always wanted me to get a degree in international law. Music is my minor, though. I can’t give it up.” It looks like he wants to say more. Instead, he looks away.

Thinking about his father makes me want to vomit. I can’t imagine him as anything more than what I saw the night he killed my parents. My hands begin to shake. It’s hard to breathe.

“Cool.” I swallow and blink several times. The room is tilting. Pain over the loss of my parents serrates my heart, and I want to scream.

It’s happening again. I haven’t had an attack like this in a couple of years, but I can feel it coming on.

In my tower, this used to happen a lot.

First, the overly fast heartbeat, my breathing coming in and out like I've just run ten miles, a tightness, the sound of water whooshing over my head.

It's a panic attack - a bad one.

I jump to my feet, not wanting to lose it in front of Austin.

Redyrin always told me I was weak.

Austin grabs my hand. "Wait. What's happening?"

I don't answer. I can't. My teeth are like a concrete wall, holding back all the agony inside my body.

If I open my mouth, everything - all the pain, the hate, the anger - will spill out.

I pull away from him.

In the past, if I were feeling this kind of agony, I would run to a piano room, not away from it. Or I would talk to Leva. She isn't around, but I'm desperate to speak to her.

I ram through the doors. Try to be polite and wave as I leave, but I'm not sure I succeeded. If I don't get away, I'm going to pass out, and I can't do that in front of Austin. I've done plenty to embarrass myself in front of him already.

As I climb the steps, it occurs to me, I forgot my blasted music.

OceanofPDF.com

LITTLE PIECES

WYSTERIA

I remove my cell phone from my back pocket and dial another number I know by heart.

“Who the hell is this?” Christopher asks as soon as he answers.

“Chris, it’s Wysteria. I need you to find Leva.” The words come out breathy.

“Wysteria? What’s wrong?” His anger turns to concern.

“I’m struggling. Having a panic attack. Leva knows what to do.” I sink down on a bench and place my head between my knees. Spots are floating across my vision. “Please. I. Really. Need. To - ” My breathing is coming in gasps. I can’t seem to get enough air.

It’s the worst panic attack I’ve ever had.

All it took was for Austin to mention his father. Talk about him like he’s anything but a monster.

It’s ripping my guts out. Tearing my heart into little pieces.

I can’t wrap my head around Austin’s father buying him a piano or doing anything nice. The man murdered my parents! A killer is all he’ll ever be to me.

More spots. I’m going to faint.

“Where are you, Wysteria? I’m coming.” Christopher is frantic. I hear it in his voice.

“The. Music. Building.” Darkness surrounds the edges of my vision, and I fall to my knees.

“Are you hurt?” he asks.

Hearing his voice calms me a little. I try to take a deep breath. “Panic attack,” I say and hope he doesn’t think I’m weak.

“Another big breath. Go on.” I hear the relief in his voice. “No one is hurting you. Talk to me.”

I suck in a breath, allowing clean air to fill my lungs as I roll onto my back and stare up at the cloudless sky. “Not physically anyway,” I say, but emotionally I’m beyond wounded. “Why aren’t you here yet?” He’s fast when he uses his vampire speed, but it seems to be taking him forever.

“I’m not in town, but I’m coming. Keep talking. What set you off?”

I take another cleansing breath and dive in. “My music professor asked me to play a duet for the Winter Gala. Doing so guarantees me another year of scholarships. I agreed right away because that’s exactly what I wanted. Then, today I met my duet partner.” I pause. My heart is racing, even at the thought of saying his name.

“And how did it go?” Christopher encourages.

“At first. Okay,” I say honestly. “But then it got messy. Really messy. And I’m hurting. So, so bad.” I sit, pulling my knees to my chest. I try to be as small as possible because the smaller I am, the less it’ll hurt.

“Physically?” He sounds panicked again.

“Emotionally,” I growl, frustrated. Leva would understand. Even when she didn’t talk to me, she was still always there and supportive. “I need Leva.”

“She knows. She’s coming with me. What hurt you emotionally?”

So he’s in Sharra. Interesting. Is cell reception really possible across realms?

Relief washes over me, though. He’s bringing Leva. “It’s Austin,” I say softly, trying not to let the words touch my body, inflict any more damage. “He’s supposed to play the duet with me.”

I hear him mutter something under his breath before he clears his throat. “I thought the two of you were friends?”

“We were. We are,” I say into the phone. “I-I keep going back and forth. It's easy to talk to him, to be around him, until I remember who his father is. Then I lose it."

"I see. What specifically set you off?"

At the memory of Austin talking about his dad, like discussing the weather, causes my heart to buckle. "He mentioned his dad."

"What did he say?"

I stand, no longer able to sit still. "He said his dad wanted him to major in business." Tears well up. They won't stop, and my eyes become blurry, the yellowing landscape glassy. The emotion and panic is ticking me off. I hate that I feel like this.

"Why did that upset you?" He's confused. I can hear it.

I grind my teeth together. I don't want to say the words. But I've learned from experience he'll spin the questions until I tell him exactly what's bothering me. "Because." My voice cracks, and I stop.

"Because," he coaxes.

"Austin's father was a murderer. But before that, he was a drunken jerk. I'll never see him any other way," I shout the last part into the phone. A couple holding hands moves off the sidewalk, giving me some much-needed space.

I feel myself getting worse again with each rise and fall of my chest. A frantic, uncontrollable agony is mounting. I don't know how to reel it in. The anguish spreads like wildfire through my body. It needs to stop, disappear.

"I get that, Wysteria. I do. And you have every right to feel the way you do."

His words do little to comfort me. "I-it hurts so much." I fall again to my knees.

The phone tumbles from my hands, and I don't care. I'm being eaten alive inside. The grief gets bigger and bigger, so overpowering, I barely notice I'm being jostled around.

Words are spoken, but I can't understand what's said. Pain fills my pores and crevices until I'm numb and desperate for relief. Instead, it grows stronger. My world crashes, my heart shatters until I am nothing.

OceanofPDF.com

MAKE IT RIGHT

AUSTIN

I debate too long about going after Wysteria, but really there's no question.

Something's wrong, and I need to find out what. Whatever I said or did to cause the devastation in her features, she went white as a sheet, and I want to fix it.

When I find her, she's on the ground.

People are gathering around, and I push past them.

One emotion burns through my body - fear.

I can't lose her again. I won't.

"Wysteria. Talk to me. What's wrong?" I fall to my knees beside her and lift her head into my lap.

"I can't. I can't. It hurts too much." Her words come out soft.

I have to lean down to catch what she's saying.

"What hurts? Where?"

"My heart. It's - I'm broken."

"No. No, you're going to be fine. I'm here." Panic sets in, and tears fill my eyes. She's been through so much. I know what it means to lose your parents, but to be imprisoned? She didn't deserve that. She only deserves happiness and love.

There's a noise coming from her phone, and I pick it up. "Hello?"

"Hello? Who is this? Put Wysteria back on the damn phone," a man commands.

"Uh, this is Austin. Morrison. Who is this?"

There's a massive sigh of relief on the other end of the phone. "This is Christopher. Take her somewhere safe. I'll be there as soon as I can."

I hang up and tuck Wysteria's phone in my pocket. Then pick her up and spin in a circle, deciding what to do next.

"Need some help, man?" a guy asks.

I peruse the group, knowing it's better if I don't use my vampire speed.

"Nah, I'm good." I start walking to my Jeep. "I'm taking her home," I say to no one in particular.

I force myself not to drive like the rules of the road don't apply to me, but it's hard. Since becoming a vampire, I see everything all at once, like life is moving in slow motion.

At my apartment building, I notice Evan's car is gone and am grateful. He and I haven't talked a lot since the night I brought Wysteria back to my place. Not that he hasn't tried. But every time he opens his mouth, it's all I can do not to punch him in his teeth.

With Wysteria in my arms, I head up the stairs and force my door open. I'll have to replace the lock, but I don't care.

Inside, I take her to my room and lay her on the bed.

Before I get the chance to cover her with a blanket, I hear someone come through my front door.

"Is she alright?" Christopher asks, concern pinching his features. Even though we're the same height, it feels like he towers over me, menacing.

"I think so."

"I'll be the judge of that." A pixilette flutters off the vampire's shoulder. Her hands raised. Magic dances along her fingers as she flies over to Wysteria. "My dearest," she says in her little voice, pressing her palm against Wysteria's forehead. She hovers there a moment while Christopher and I watch. Finally, she flies back over to Chris. "She's fine. Her heart is back to normal, and she's breathing regularly." She faces me, her hands now on her hips. "So, you're

Austin?"

She looks ready to fight.

"That's right, and you are?"

"I'm Leva, boy! Don't you know anything?" She stomps her foot like I've offended her. "I thought you said he was smart," she says to Christopher.

The vampire chuckles, his face relaxing. "He's smarter than most." Christopher turns to me, his eyes telling me I better make things right with the pixilette.

"Right. Sorry," I say, feeling sheepish. "I should've known that. "It's nice to meet you."

"We'll be in the living room," Christopher says to her before heading out of the room.

I follow him out. It's been a while since we spoke, and I still haven't told him Wysteria knows what I am or about how Doug and Gary and possibly Snow White at this point, know as well.

"What the hell happened?" Christopher turns on me, his fangs flashing. "I told you to take care of her. Watch out for her. Instead, you have her frazzled."

"I swear, I don't know why. We were playing a song and talking. It was nice. Then something happened." I'm pacing and talking, unsure what I did, but desperate to know the truth.

He shakes his head. "It's about your father," Christopher says, rubbing a hand over his face.

"What about him?" I stop, shoving my hands in my front pockets.

Christopher walks over to my couch and sits. "It's time you know what Wysteria knows," he says, patting the spot beside him.

I'm not sure I want to know but sit down. "What?"

"Wysteria saw your dad the night her parents were killed. He was holding a slayer gun and her mother's purse. After your father and another man left the house, Wysteria ran inside and found her parents dead, lying in pools of their own blood."

In all the world, I never expected to hear what I did. "No," I say as a whole new level of understanding washes over me. "My dad was chief of police. He and Wysteria's parents were friends." I shake my head, trying to wrap my thoughts and feelings around what Christopher's just told me. "I can't believe he would do something like that."

"Well," Christopher pauses and massages the back of his neck. "I resisted believing it too, but Wysteria has never been a liar. So I've done some digging." He sits back, resting an arm on the back of my couch. "What do you know about your father's heritage?"

"He had elven blood. Mom was human." I shrug, turning so I can watch his face. Evan said he and my uncle were elven royalty, but I really didn't buy it. "Why?" Besides, I want to see what Christopher has discovered.

"Your uncle and your dad were second and third in line for the elven crown, but their oldest brother, the king, banished them from the realm." He stops, studying me intently. "But you knew that already." He's surprised. "Why didn't you tell me?"

"I heard my dad say something about it one time when he was drunk. After he died, Evan told me what you just did, but honestly, I didn't really believe it." I clasp my hands together nervously. "I still struggle to think it's real. That in another realm, I would be part of the royal family."

"You are part of the royal family," Christopher corrects, his voice stern.

I nod solemnly. "Not that it means anything though. I'm here in the human realm. The king of the elves probably doesn't know I exist. Hell, I feel the opposite of noble. It's difficult to pay my own bills."

Christopher pats me on the back. "You're a good guy. Your uncle and cousin - " He doesn't finish the sentence. "Never leave Wysteria alone with either of them. I don't trust them. From all I've discovered about them, they're into some shady magical shit, and I don't want Wysteria near that."

"I agree," I say, as a wall of sadness rolls over me. My family is twisted, and I feel utterly alone.

"Not only that, but I think your uncle is getting ready to make a play for the crown. I've heard whisperings that he is planning something but haven't been able to find out what." He drags a hand down his face. "You should watch out for them too. If your uncle is after the throne, then you're a threat." Christopher stands abruptly like he's going to leave, but I still have stuff to tell him.

"She knows I'm a vampire," I say, standing too, mentally setting aside what he said about my uncle. "It wasn't planned, but it happened."

"It's fine," he says, distracted. "She was bound to find out, especially the more the two of you spent time together. What did she say?"

"She seems okay with it. I mean, we haven't really talked about it, but as far as I can tell, my vampirism doesn't bother her."

He places a hand on my shoulder. It's fatherly, and I'm moved by the simple act. "I need you to keep her safe. There's a lead I'm following up and can't stay, so I'm counting on you."

"I will," I say, and then blurt. "I love her."

He smiles and lets out a deep chuckle. "I know. How does she feel about you?"

I hang my head. "I'm not sure. It wasn't too long after I shared with her my feelings that all this happened."

Christopher puts his other hand on my other shoulder and looks into my eyes. "I guess you'd better find out then." He winks and goes to the door. "Tell her - "

"Wait," I say, holding up a hand.

"What else?" His eyes narrow.

Christopher will be disappointed, but there was no way to help it.

I tell him about Gary and Doug and how I revealed my secret inadvertently to help Wysteria.

He isn't happy.

"I'll talk to Snow White."

That has me nervous. The laws are clear. Turning someone into a vampire without prior clearance is basically a death sentence. "Okay," I whisper.

Christopher smiles wryly. "Everything will be fine." He pulls something from his pocket. It's a bracelet. A small wooden bear is attached. The charm looks like it's aged and been through a lot. "Give this to Wysteria. Tell her it's from me and to wear it always."

"I will," I say, taking it from him.

His hazel eyes soften. "And tell her I'll be back and that I asked you to look after her."

That makes me panic. "She'll ask why and how you know me. Wys is smarter than most."

He laughs again. "Tell Wysteria the truth." Then he lowers his voice. "But ask her to keep it between us."

"Got it," I say, but he's already gone.

OceanofPDF.com

ALWAYS NEW

WYSTERIA

The smell of buttered toast infiltrates my oblivion.

I roll over, groggy.

Rub my eyes.

Clear my throat. It's parched like I haven't had water in a very long time.

My eyes blink open, and reality sets in. I'm not in my room. This blanket covering me isn't mine. This bed isn't mine, and I lift the light blue comforter.

My shirt is twisted around my waist.

"Where am I?" Fear sends my heart racing, and I sit up, searching the room.

The bedroom is small.

Only a double bed, a desk, and a chest of drawers.

There's a bathroom to the left of a doorway, which is wide open. Something about the room is familiar.

A second later, it dawns on me. This is Austin's bedroom. I've been here once before, briefly before he escorted me out.

How did I get here? Last I remember, I was talking to Christopher on the phone while having a panic attack.

The attack was one of the worst I've experienced.

As I search the room, I think Austin must've found me and taken care of me.

"Where is he?" I throw my feet over the edge of the bed but pause, unsure what to do next.

Alert Austin, I'm awake? Say nothing? Hide my face in shame over whatever I may have done? Sneak out the front?

Before I can decide, Austin turns the corner carrying a plate and a glass of something. As soon as he sees me, his face lights up.

“You’re awake.” He’s in faded jeans and a white tee. His hair is perfectly messy. His eyes are dancing with mischief. “Are you hungry?”

I am, in fact, starved.

But I can’t tell Austin that. I seem to have lost the capacity to speak.

“There’s blueberries. I remember when we were kids, you loved blueberries.” He sits beside me, flashing the plate's contents, consisting of blueberries, cantaloupe, and toast. His features soften. “Feeling better?”

“I-uh, how long have I been here?” My words catch in my scratchy throat.

He hands me orange juice, and I take a drink. It tastes so good I can’t help but drink it all while watching his face. When the glass is empty, he offers me the plate, and I take it. Buttered toast is my favorite food on the planet. There’s something about the smell of toast and sweet cream butter combined. The taste when the crispiness of the bread and melted butter hit my tongue. But my stomach is sick, and fettered, and twisted up in so many knots I doubt I’ll ever be able to unravel them all.

“At least take a bite,” he pleads kindly, lifting a berry to my lips.

I open my mouth, and he plops it inside. The juice explodes between my teeth when I bite down. “Mmm.” I feel myself smile.

He picks up another, and we repeat the process until they’re gone.

“Toast?” he asks, picking it up, and touching the edge to my bottom lip.

I search his features, curious about why he’s playing nursemaid. Feeding me, even though I'm enjoying the act immensely. I sink my teeth into the buttery warmth. It's so good. I take the toast from him and have another bite.

"How long?" I ask again when I finish chewing.

"Through the night. You missed English this morning, and Witchy Spears was none too happy. But I sent her an email, calming her down. Hope that wasn't too forward of me."

"No, I appreciate it. Thank you." I take another bite.

"You're welcome." He shrugs, seemingly calm.

"Sage!" I whisper-shout, remembering my roommate. She's probably worried.

"Don't worry, I texted her on your phone. She knows where you are." He smiles languidly.

I can't help my sigh of relief. "Did she seem okay?"

Austin chuckles lightly. "You two have developed a bond, I take it."

"Definitely. Sage is like a sister to me." I nibble another bite of toast. The bread is multigrain - my favorite kind.

"And what am I? Chopped tuna salad?"

I blink several times at the sound of the tinkling voice, unable to believe what I'm seeing, which is Leva flying toward me. "Leva?" I set down my toast and brush the crumbs from my hands. "Is it really you?" Tears well up in my eyes as I hold out my hand.

She lands, her emerald green hair changing to peach. Tears drop onto her cheeks like tiny crystals. "You had another panic attack, didn't you?"

I glance at Austin. "Yes," I say to them both.

"I've never been so scared," he says softly.

"I'm sorry," I say to him, appreciating his nearness and then look at Leva. "I'm especially sorry for saying I didn't want you here. Can you ever forgive me?"

She drops her hands from her hips and flies up, touching her hands to my nose, so I go cross-eyed. She giggles. “All is forgiven,” she says.

“Thank you.”

She flies back, and I close my eyes, allowing them to readjust. When I open them, Leva is hovering in front of Austin, her hair changing to black, the color of his shirt. “How about you formally introduce me to this guy.”

“Of course. Austin, this is my best friend, Leva.”

“Hello.” He does a little wave like he’s nervous. It’s cute.

My pulse flutters. With him, it’s always new. I want him to hold me, kiss me, love me, but not with Leva here.

My best friend looks at me. “I need some rest. I’ll meet you back at your room.”

I feel my eyebrows rise. “You know where I’m staying?”

“Christopher showed me.” She crosses her arms as her hair and clothes become white as the apartment’s walls.

“How is my brother?” I’d been talking to him on the phone. He was who I expected to wake up to.

“He’s fine. Good. Working,” she says but doesn’t elaborate. “I’ll see you later,” she says and flies out of the room.

“Will she need me to open the door for her?” Austin asks, getting ready to stand.

I press a hand on his knee. “No,” I say, knowing with her magic, she’s never had a problem.

“Cool.” He covers my hand with one of his. Then sets the plate on the floor beside him. “Alone at last,” he says, his gorgeous eyes taking me in.

“Yep,” is all I can get out. He flusters me in a good way. Also, we’re sitting on his bed.

“Christopher told me it was my father who killed your parents,” he says.

I suck in a breath, surprised he’s bringing it up. “I saw him,” I admit through clenched teeth, pulling my hand away, wondering how the knowledge will change things between us.

Austin takes my hand back and presses it over his heart. “I believe you,” he says. “And I’m sorry. I didn’t know.” He shakes his head. “I always knew my dad was a jack ass. Apparently, he was so much worse.”

“You didn’t do anything.” As I watch his emotions shred his features, there’s no doubt he didn’t know what his father did. Not only that, but he isn’t like him in any way.

“Thank you for saying that,” he says. “But my family tree is a mess. There’s something else.”

“What?” I know I should be paying attention, but all I can think about is his lips on mine, and I throw a leg over his lap, straddling him.

OceanofPDF.com

TASTE EVERY INCH

WYSTERIA

He's surprised but doesn't stop me. In fact, he grabs my thighs and adjusts me, so I'm right against him. At the closeness, everything else is forgotten.

"Kiss me," he says, his eyes on my lips.

"Are you compelling me?" I ask, teasing.

"No," he says and then smiles, biting his bottom lip. "Do I need to?"

In answer to his question, I lean in, pressing my lips to his, wrapping my arms around his neck.

He groans, pressing my mouth open and diving in with his tongue.

I let out a sound, like a kitten, and that seems to turn him on. His hands find their way under my shirt, his fingers caressing my skin, causing it to tighten. "Wysteria," he says against my mouth.

In answer, I pull back, locking eyes with him - my hands on his face. "I love you too," I say. At that moment, I mean it too. With everything I am.

His eyes are hooded, and I can feel what he wants. I want him too, but I am unfamiliar with how going about getting there works. "Austin, I - how?"

"Can I try something?" he asks, suckling my bottom lip, then trailing kissing down my neck.

I think I know what he wants, and I'm game. "You want to taste me?" I ask, my breath shuddering.

He groans again. "In more ways than one." He kisses my neck. Licks it.

I'm curious about whether it's even possible for his fangs to penetrate my skin. “Bite me,” I whisper, encouraging.

He doesn’t hesitate. I feel his fangs pierce into my skin. At first, I’m surprised. I didn’t think it was possible. There’s even pain, but only for a second, and then it feels so good.

There’s a tug, and I know he’s sucking my blood. It should be weird, but I’m in a lusty haze and feel better than I’ve ever felt. “Don’t stop,” I say, winding my hands through his hair, holding him there as I move against him.

His arms tighten around me so I can barely breathe, not that I want to. And I throw my head back as wild abandon pushes through my veins, through my pounding heart, and along my skin.

Too soon, he stops, licking my skin, and then pulls back.

It’s then I notice my skin is glowing indigo. There’s something on the side of his mouth, and I wipe it, showing him.

“Wysteria,” he says, and it’s like he’s been drugged. He kisses my finger, suckling at the blood. “You taste so good, better than - ” His voice trails off. He opens his eyes, but only part of the way. “I will never get enough of you.”

“I’m yours. All of me until the end of time,” I say, kissing him.

“I want to taste every inch of you,” he whispers against my lips. Then kisses me hard and passionate. His fingers move to my shirt, and we part briefly as he lifts it over my head.

I fumble with the buttons of his shirt, but finally, get them all undone. As I remove it, I stop kissing him. I want to see him. He’s so hot. Abs for days. Warm, tan skin. Muscles. I trace my fingers along his collarbones, and he shivers. His hands are on my waist as he watches me.

“Wysteria,” he says, then leans in, kissing the spot where my heart is beating.

“Yes?” I don’t want to stop, but he seems to be slowing down.

“I want everything you’re offering.” He pauses. “Blue blood and glowing skin and everything else."

"But?" Is he turning me down? Am I not good enough? Heat rushes up to my cheeks.

"Let's go on a date," he says and smiles softly. "We've already told each other we love each other, but we haven't even had an official first date."

Relief washes over me. I laugh - a real, genuine laugh. Like I haven't laughed in seven years. "I'd like that."

"Cool." He stands, helping me to my feet.

My thighs are shaky with need. I can't help but wonder if all the talk about Austin making the rounds with a bunch of girls is a lie. A rumor. He's so beyond sweet, even as a vampire.

"I'll take you back to your dorm room, but first I need a shower," he says and walks into the bathroom, closing the door behind him.

I fall back onto his bed, thinking I want to join him, but resist. If he can, then so can I.

I'M GIDDY LIKE A SCHOOLGIRL, and I can't hold still. Sage is working on my hair. She's burned her finger on the iron twice.

After the third time, she bonks me on the head with it. "I swear I'm going to shove this up to your nose if you don't freaking hold still." She sticks the curling iron in my face and scowls.

"Ouch. Fine. No need for violence."

Leva said she could do my hair with magic. That using magic is much easier. She and Sage get into a squabble until I diffuse the situation, asking Leva to do my make up. She left, saying she needed to get a few things and hasn't returned, but I don't worry. It's only been an hour.

"You haven't seen me violent." Sage is glaring, but the fact that her lips are twitching with near-laughter negates all the pretend anger in her eyes.

“Okay. Okay.” I hold my hands up in surrender.

“Good.” She grabs another chunk of hair and twirls it in the iron. “What are you going to wear?”

I shrug. “Jeans, my purple tee, and black ballet flats.”

She yanks on my hair. “Boring. Awful. And grotesque. No.”

I want to be offended, but I can’t. I’m too excited. And nervous. And terrified. And thrilled. And shocked. And full of trepidation. My internal thoughts are quick, like my mind is playing at fast-forward. Before I got to my room, I went into the bathroom and checked out where Austin bit me in the mirror. There isn’t a trace of what he did, of what I let him do to me.

“I’ve got the perfect outfit in mind. Trust your roomie,” Sage says, interrupting my thoughts.

I glance at her. “Not too wild, though.”

“Psssshhhh. Don’t question me. I know what I’m doing.” Sage picks up her comb and tousles my curls. Sets it down and picks up her purse. “I’m going to run to the bathroom. I’ll be right back.” At the door, she stops. “Don’t mess with your hair.”

“I won’t.”

I pick up my Sudoku but can’t focus. Every time I try, all I see is Austin’s face, and I feel the way his lips caressed mine, our bodies pressed together, the way he drank from me. The butterflies in my belly stop fluttering and sway languidly, moving to Nina Simone.

Sage comes back in with animated energy. Sniffling, she sets her purse on her bed. “Alright, let’s get you an outfit.” She goes to her closet. “Do you want your outfit to say, ‘I’m sweet and innocent?’ “She pulls a white sundress from her cabinet.

I shake my head.

“This is disgusting. I don’t even know where it came from.” She tosses the dress on the floor. “What about, ‘I want you?’” She pulls out a black halter dress. It V’s down to the waist and would barely cover my butt.

“How about something in between? Something that says, ‘I like you, a lot, but this is our first date.’” I move to stand beside her. “Got anything in your closet that says that?”

OceanofPDF.com

WYSTERIA

She huffs but dives back in. “Probably.” Clothes fly everywhere as she searches. Skirts. Shirts. Leggings. Dresses.

“Sage. Seriously. I can wear my jeans. You don’t need to go to all this trouble. It’s dinner.” I think. I really don’t know what he has planned for our first date.

I sink onto her bed, knocking her purse to the floor. The contents spill out. A tampon. Some folded cash. Change. Her student ID. Lip-gloss. And a small baggie more than half-filled with sparkling white powder. I pick it up as Sage is turning around, a victorious look on her face. Until she sees what I’m holding.

Her face falls, and she drops the clothes.

“What is this?” I’m sure I know. My parents told me all about drugs, including the magical kind.

She grabs it out of my hand. “How dare you go through my things?”

“I didn’t. I swear. Your purse fell off the bed.” Sage is on her knees, picking up the stuff that’s spilled everywhere. I kneel next to her and place a hand over her clenched fist. The one holding the white powder. “Want to talk about it? No judgments.”

She glances up. Her eyes are watery. She sniffles.

And I cringe.

“There’s nothing to talk about. I like it. I like the way it makes me feel.” She stands, opens her hand. “Want a hit?”

I shake my head and move over to my bed. “No, thanks.”

She shrugs, tucking her purse under her bed. “You won’t say anything?”

Warning bells ring in my head. Should I say something? What if the campus police find out she has it in our dorm room? Or worse, the Supernatural Task Force? Will I get in trouble too? How much is she using? Could she die?

Even as the questions pummel my mind, I know I won't say anything. "No, of course not. I only want to make sure you're okay. You know you can tell me anything."

Sage sits next to me. "I use it to help me feel more confident, less like an ugly nobody." She sniffles. "And college is hard. It takes more than coffee to keep me up and alert."

"I don't think drugs are the answer," I say softly.

"Don't be a goody-goody, Wys. Everyone does it. Drugs are part of the college experience." She crosses her arms, glaring.

I disagree, and maybe she's right. I am a goody-goody, but I'm okay with that. "It'll stay between you and me." I reach out and grab her hand. "But please be careful. And you most definitely are not ugly."

She smiles. "I will. Thanks." Her words aren't convincing. I think of the last two parties and what those vampires did to her. She got them back, but it was only temporary since I healed them. But what happened is still eating at her. She needs to talk to someone.

Leva returns then. She has lavender and uses it to make me some eyeshadow. So I pretend like I'm okay with what Sage is doing even though I'm not.

Sage stuffs the baggie in her front jeans pocket and picks up the clothes she dropped. When my makeup is done, she hands me some clothes. "Put these on. Austin is going to be here soon. Do you have a black bra?"

I tilt my head and raise an eyebrow. "Seriously?"

"She doesn't need a black bra," Leva says in a huff.

"So, no," Sage says, ignoring the pixilette and moving back to her closet. She pulls a spaghetti strap tank with a shelf bra out and tosses it at me. “Wear this.”

I slide out of my sweatpants and shirt. Turn away from Sage and take off my bra. Then I reach back. “Tank, please.”

“Are you sure about this?” Leva asks, giving me a look that says she disapproves of my clothing choice.

“Definitely,” I say, smiling at her. She’s seen me naked hundreds of times, and I’m not embarrassed.

Leva crosses her arms as Sage puts the shirt in my hand. I slide it over my head.

“Skirt.”

She hands it over, and I shimmy it on. It’s black, super tight, and hugs my body in all the right places.

“Top.”

It’s a see-through lavender blouse. Very feminine and pretty. I glance at myself in the oval full-length mirror Sage bought the other day.

“This is beautiful.” I turn back and forth, admiring my reflection.

“Of course, it is.” Sage looks at Leva, triumphant. “You did an excellent job on her makeup.

Leva, who’s been kind of a pill around Sage, softens. “Thank you.”

“Welcome.” Sage digs through her dozens of shoeboxes and brings back a pair of black heels. They are high and look incredibly hazardous. “Put these on. They say sophisticated, but with subtlety.”

I slide them on.

“Beautiful, Wysteria. You’ve got great legs.”

“Thanks, Sage.” I sit on my bed and start applying lotion to my calves, knees, and thighs.

“Yeah, nothing like dry knees to ruin a good outfit.” Sage sits next to me.

“I’m handling it.”

“Let me,” Leva says and sends some of her pixilette magic at my legs. Instantly, they are as smooth as silk. Or smoother. I’ve never had a problem with my skin.

Sage lays back. “What about the V situation? How do you intend to handle that as well?”

“What V situation?” Leva is suddenly concerned.

“Nothing,” I say nervously.

“Oh, it’s something. Wysteria has never had sex before. Tonight might be the night.” She wiggles her eyebrows as Leva hovers above the two of us.

At Sage’s words, Leva’s skin turns bright pink. “Wys isn’t ready for that,” she says, pursing her lips.

“Well,” I say, thinking about earlier.

“Wys!” Leva is in shock. “Give it a few dates, at least.”

“I’m going to take it slow,” I say for Leva’s benefit, but I can’t help the need in my lower belly as I remember him kissing me and touching me and, I mean, I am in love with him. At least I think so.

“What are you thinking?” Sage turns on her side and leans on an arm.

I cover my eyes. “Kissing Austin,” I admit.

“What was it like?”

“Oh, good question.” Leva sits on Sage’s arm, looking beyond interested.

I’m surprised Sage doesn’t think my kiss is trivial. Silly. She’s kissed lots of guys and done a lot more. “It was the best moment in my life,” I tell her truthfully.

Leva gasps. “You like him that much?”

“Yes,” I admit.

“That good, huh?” Sage is scrutinizing my face.

I wonder what her first kiss was like.

“I’ve never kissed someone when I was sober,” Sage admits, her eyes dropping to my comforter.

Leva doesn’t say anything but seems to be thinking about something.

I fall back beside Sage. “Really?”

She sighs, rolling away. “Never mind. Sorry. I’m always talking about situations that are awkward for other people.”

“Hey, I don’t mind. I’m the queen of awkward. I spent seven years in prison, remember?” Sage doesn’t respond, and I want to reach out and hug her. Tell her how grateful I am for her. Tell her I consider her the sister I always wished I had. But I don’t. “We need to find you a sober boyfriend,” I say lightly, placing a hand on her shoulder. She shrugs my hand away.

Leva flies into the air, hovering near the window. She’s upset. I can tell, but first, I need to deal with Sage. “I didn’t mean - ”

“I don’t need any favors.” Sage pushes off my bed and pulls on her combat boots. Without looking back, she grabs her purse and says, “Have fun on your date.” Then she’s gone, the door slamming behind her.

I sigh, wishing I knew what to do for her. And maybe that’s the problem. I don’t need to do anything except be her friend. Love her.

That goes for Leva too. She’s sulking, and I go over to the window to stand beside her. “Leva, what’s wrong?” It’s dark outside. Cars drive by, and college students are laughing and joking.

“Everything is changing so fast,” she says so softly I barely hear her. “Soon enough, you won’t want me around anymore.”

“Leva, that’s not true. I’ll always need you.” I hold out my hand, and she steps onto the tip of my middle finger.

“Promise?” she asks, her hair and dress changing to the color of midnight with twinkling stars illuminating around her.

“Yes, I promise,” I say.

OceanofPDF.com

HE'S FAMILY

WYSTERIA

Are you going to eat that?" Austin points at the gruesome brown shells filled with a rubbery jelly-looking substance sitting on a plate in front of me.

My nose scrunches. "Most definitely not." I poke one of the shells with my fork. "This is escargot?" I mean, sure, I'm all about trying new things, but not this.

"Yes. Snails." He covers his mouth with the back of his hand.

And I glare. "That's disgusting." I lean in so that I can whisper. "They even smell bad."

He doesn't hide his laughter this time. "I know. I can smell them from here."

"Well, why did you let me order them?"

He shrugs. "I thought you knew what you were doing." He moves to get one of the waiter's attention. The guy notices and comes over. He's wearing black pants, a white shirt, a red bow tie, and a red vest.

"Yes, sir?"

Austin picks up the plate of snails and hands them to the waiter. "Please take these away. The lady," he indicates me, "has changed her mind."

The waiter nods. "No problem, Mr. Morrison." He takes the plate and turns to me. "Would you care for anything else?"

"No, thank you. I'm good." I can't help fiddling with the napkin in my lap, folding and unfolding it.

"Very well." He walks away.

"You sure you don't want anything else?" Austin places an outstretched hand on the table and wiggles his fingers. He's asking if he can hold my hand, and I happily comply. His fingers entwine with mine, making my skin prickle, my whole body vibrate. It's as though nothing else exists but his hand and mine.

"You look beautiful," he says, caressing my hand.

"Thanks," I say, my mind and body still focusing on his touch. "So do you." I make eye contact and smile at the intensity in his eyes.

"What do you think of this place?" he asks, looking around.

"It's nice," I say, clearing my throat. A little too nice, I think but don't say aloud.

The restaurant is super fancy.

Thick white linen tablecloths cover each rounded table, adorned with red Delphiniums arranged into centerpieces. The silver tableware is real, and the plates are heavy with hand-painted gold filigree around the edges. Not only that, but the napkins are thicker than my bath towels.

The best part about the fancy place is the ten-piece orchestra playing Pachelbel Canon in D. At the thought, I focus on the music, letting my eyes close. The bass begins, then the violins and violas along with the cello - a beautiful round of notes. I can't help but close my eyes and listen. Even though this piece of music is considered mainstream classical, it's always been one of my favorites. I focus on each note. The violins play staccato on the E string while the viola and second violins continue the recurring round.

The gut-wrenching pain at the loss of my parents calms slightly at the music. I take a deep breath. Austin squeezes my hand, and I open my eyes.

"Everything okay?" His brows are pinched together. Worry presses his lips into a frown.

"Yes, just listening. No matter how many times I hear this song, I still love it."

He wipes his mouth. "I like it too."

A different waiter brings our main course. He seems familiar. “Here you are.” He sets a plate in front of me.

Austin moves his appetizer of minestrone soup. The waiter places a plate in front of him.

“Would you like some fresh Parmesan on your Chicken Marsala?” he asks me politely.

“Sure.”

He begins grating. “Tell me when.”

“That’s good,” I say after a few spins of the grater.

“And for you, sir?”

“No, thanks, Evan.” Austin smirks. “You’re really laying it on thick, cuz.”

Evan’s eyes go wide. “Just putting on a good show.” He slaps Austin on the back before looking at me. “I can’t believe you’re little Wysteria Hart. Pudgy Wudgy. You used to be chunky around the middle. Not anymore, though. You’re stunning.”

I look down at my plate. Heat is rising up my neck and covering my cheeks. A lot of kids called me Pudgy Wudgy. One memory of my time at Gothel elementary I don’t care to think about. And now I remember Evan and that I never liked him. But for Austin’s sake, I try to be nice. “Thanks, I guess.” I pick up my fork and spin it in my noodles.

“That’ll be all, Evan.” I hear the controlled anger in Austin’s voice.

“Come on. I want - ” Evan begins.

“Get out of here and leave us alone,” Austin snarls, keeping his voice low. “Or I’m going to tell Uncle you’re sucking at your job.”

I glance up in time to see Evan grind his teeth.

“Fine.” He walks away. “But I see what’s going on.”

I watch and wonder about him. He’s a couple of years older than me and always got Austin into trouble. The only reason he didn’t end up in juvenile detention is because of Austin’s dad. It paid to be related to the chief of police. Not to mention his involvement with the Supernatural Task Force. Evan's dad wasn't part of it, but Austin's dad was the liaison.

Even though I knew Austin had elven blood in his veins, I didn't know much more. Austin never really liked to talk about it.

I shake my head at that thinking. I don't want to go there. Not right now. Instead, I look at Austin, admiring him. He's wearing dark jeans, a gray shirt unbuttoned at the neck, and a navy-blue jacket. He looks exquisite, not as dressed up like everyone else, but gorgeous. Everyone seems to know him, and I wonder if he brings all of his dates here. I push the thought away. I heard his anger when he spoke to Evan. Austin's protecting me. I can't help but like the way it warms my insides, makes me feel cared for. I'm going to focus on that.

"Sorry about my cousin," Austin says, playing with my hand still lying on the table. "Do you remember him?"

"Kind of," I say because I don't want to have to lie about how I feel about the guy.

"He's family," he says matter-of-factly like that's supposed to explain why he knows the guy or associates with him.

"Yeah," I say, pulling my hand away.

The way his cousin acted, so flippant about the awful nickname, I don't buy it. I'm not sure I'm ready to be back in Austin's world, even as much as I want to be with him. Maybe this isn't a good idea.

"I mean, he's pretty much always an ass. Most of the time, I choose to ignore it." He cuts into his medium-rare steak before sticking it in his mouth and chewing. "But, I'm sorry. He's like a brother to me, and sometimes I forget what he's like until I see him through someone else's eyes."

"It's okay." I think of Sage and her issues. We've only known each other for a few weeks, and I consider her family. But if my aunt and uncle met her, they'd probably have me switch rooms.

"You going to try your chicken?" He points at my plate with his knife.

OceanofPDF.com

REEL FEELINGS

WYSTERIA

"Yep." I cut into the chicken, then add some sauce and noodles before sticking the bite in my mouth. After chewing a few times, I smile. "It's good."

"I know, right? Uncle Linroe runs the best restaurant in Gothel Springs."

I nod. Swallow, and focus on my plate. Talk of his family is making me uncomfortable.

"Did I hear my name being spoken in vain?" A man with dark eyes and dark hair with silver dusting his sideburns saunters over to our table. He's an older version of Evan with a paunch. His forehead is broad, and his face is stern. For the first time, I can see that he has elf blood in him.

Austin stands, clapping his uncle on the back. The man does the same to Austin. I try to smile but don't quite make it. My heart starts to race. Something about this man doesn't sit right with me.

Finally, they stop embracing, and his uncle turns to me.

My breath catches in my throat. I'm not sure why.

He sticks out his hand. "You must be Wysteria Hart. I'm Linroe Morrison. Nice to meet you." He has an easy smile and a deep timbre to his voice. Likable like his brother, but to me, it feels false.

I rise and take his outstretched hand. It's warm. "Nice to meet you too."

His smile widens, and he grips my hand tighter, but only for a moment before releasing me. "I'll let the two of you get back to your dinner."

"Thanks," Austin says. "The food is delicious, as always."

Austin's uncle turns his gaze on me, and I see a flicker of coldness in his eyes. "You didn't like the escargot?"

I glance at Austin for help. It wasn't that I didn't like it; I didn't even try it. My stomach roiled at the thought.

Thankfully, Austin steps in. "When she ordered it, she didn't know what it was. I should've told her. It's my fault."

His uncle raises a dismissive hand. "Nonsense, boy. Think nothing of it." He gives me a final glance before walking away.

I feel my head tilt in confusion, and I sit.

Austin does the same, tucking his napkin back on his lap. The man has manners. It's sexy.

"I didn't mean to upset him," I say, wishing my pulse would slow down.

"Don't worry. My uncle is a little on the odd side." He shrugs and goes back to his food.

I try to do the same, but it tastes like powder in my mouth.

"Why did you start playing the piano?" Austin asks, as though everything is normal.

I want our conversation to be normal. I do. He asked a basic question, and I want to answer, but another panic attack is coming on. I feel it, sense it. My hands are shaking, and my bottom lip trembles. I stand, knocking my chair over. "I-I - oh my gosh, I have to go." I throw my napkin on the table and stand, pushing back the chair.

"Wysteria?" Shock contorts his face, and he stands too. "What's wrong?"

"Nothing. I'm sorry. I shouldn't be here." My legs are shaky, but I can't do this. Why did I think I could? I push past waiters and patrons. Brush past Austin's uncle and stumble out the front door. The night air is frigid, and shivers run up and down my back. I bend over, putting my hands on my knees, and inhale deep breaths, like a fish out of water.

That's what I am.

I don't know how I thought dating Austin, or kissing Austin, or doing anything else with Austin was a good idea. It isn't. Even as I think such things, I want to kick myself.

He isn't his damn father. I know this.

Austin is suddenly beside me. "Wysteria?" He says my name with concern, running a hand along my back.

I scan his face, seeing the uneasiness and worry. He reminds me of his uncle.

When his eyes find mine, his lips lift into a tense smile. "What's going on?"

I want to relax, but I'm not. I'm seriously ruffled. "A lot is going on in here," I say, putting a hand to my heart. "I just can't." I walk away but immediately turn back, running into his outstretched arms.

"Did I do something?" he asks his breath in my hair.

"Yes! No." I sag against him. "You don't understand."

He kisses the top of my head. "Tell me then." His hands are gently massaging my back, sending bolts of desire through my body.

I press my head against his chest and breathe in his aftershave, clean laundry, and a little garlic.

"Wysteria?"

"Ugh, it's nothing." I don't want to dredge up the past again. I don't want him to feel bad. "It's happening again, like the other day."

"A panic attack?"

I nod my head. "It sounds stupid, but I need to lie down."

"Come on, then. Let me take you home."

"'Kay."

He drives me to Irvine Hall without saying a word. I'm not sure if it's because he's concentrating or if his mind is elsewhere, but I can't help admiring his profile, the way he holds himself, his strong jaw, and long lashes. The quiet of the ride has me feeling calmer. The panic is mostly gone, just a slight rumble.

“What are you looking at?” he asks, surprising me.

“You,” I respond simply, unashamed that I’ve been caught.

A big grin fills his handsome face. “You love me?”

My breath hitches. “I think so,” I admit quietly, surprised that his words ring so true in my heart.

His shoulders drop. “And I love you.” After he puts the Jeep in park, he runs around to my side and opens my door. “Take my hand.”

I do, enjoying the heat of his fingers against my skin. When my feet touch the ground, he kisses me, quick but tender.

I lean into him, kiss him back with fervor, and enjoying my giddy feelings while pushing down the anxiousness.

“Hopefully, we’ll get this dating thing right,” Austin says playfully when we release each other.

“You’ll be patient?” Now, I know the panic attack started because of his cousin and uncle, not because of him.

“Damn right. We have time,” he says, tapping the tip of my nose with his finger. He kisses me again, this time for longer, and I wrap my arms around his waist.

“I’ll see you tomorrow, Wys. Should we meet in the practice room at five? Professor Jenkins gave us a standing reservation.”

I quickly do a mental scan through my day. “I’d like that.”

“Then afterward, we can try dinner again?”

“Definitely. But this time, maybe someplace less fancy?” I don't say what I mean, which is I want to go someplace that doesn't have his uncle or cousin around.

His smile brightens his whole face. “Anything for you.” He walks away, then turns back.

I try to think of something witty to say. When we were younger, I called him Brace Face and Frizz Head. Neither of those names work now. Words like “hottie” and “gorgeous” enter my mind.

Before I come up with anything, he winks. “By the way, I have your music. I’ll bring it.”

“That’d be great,” I say, crossing my arms. I don’t want him to go. I want more time in his arms, and I want him to drink from me again. The first time was very erotic. I try asking him with my eyes, too embarrassed to say what I want with my mouth.

Apparently, he isn’t a mind reader, and he gets in his Jeep and drives away.

OceanofPDF.com

COUSIN IS FISHING

AUSTIN

"Wysteria seems nice," Evan says, closing his apartment door as I walk up the steps. He zips his jacket, pulls out a pack of cigarettes, flicks the lighter, and ignites one.

Since we have elven blood and our lives are naturally extended, he doesn't believe rules apply. That thinking gets him into trouble all the time. Drugs. Smoking. Drinking. Gambling. To him, the danger is part of living.

I didn't like that stuff before I became a vampire. Okay, expect occasionally I would have a beer or two. Maybe drink shots and get slightly wild.

Now, though, none of that stuff affects me.

Currently, my problem is Wysteria's blood. She let me drink from her, and it was - life-altering. Even now, as I think about it, my knees go weak.

Her blood is like nothing I've tasted.

Not only that, but it's made me feel different. Stronger. Faster. My vision is more precise. And it's not just the physical stuff.

I can sense emotion, like with Evan. He's acting calm and relaxed, but he's on edge. It's like Wysteria's blood took all of my vampire powers and enhanced them one hundred times.

What's worse, her blood has me craving more.

What if I go too far? What if I can't stop myself? And worst of all? What if someone else finds out about the fact that I can penetrate her skin and drink her blood? Vampires everywhere will come for her.

"She is," I say, a second later, tucking my hands into my pockets. The air is freezing, the sky clear, and millions of stars shine overhead.

Even the Milky Way is visible. I don't want to talk to him about Wysteria.

Evan inhales and exhales, walks over to the old balcony, where I'm standing, and leans his elbows on the wooden railing.

"She seems like a lot of drama too," he says. "What's her deal? Have you found out why she was taken to another realm?" His questions are more than curiosity, and I wonder what he's getting at.

He isn't going to drop the subject of Wysteria. Maybe I should find out why.

"Definitely some drama, but she's been through a lot. I can handle it." I avoid answering the question about the other realm. Because I do know, but it's none of his business.

"And the other stuff?" Evan prods. He never was good at playing cards. Way too easy to read. This time isn't any different.

I lean next to him, stealing the cigarette from his hand and taking a drag. Then shrug as I expel the smoke.

"No idea." I take another drag and hand the cigarette back. It's like ash in my throat. A waste of time, but Evan doesn't know I'm a vampire, and I need to keep it that way.

"There's talk around town that she's something special." Evan's eyes narrow, and he searches my face.

Suddenly, I'm on edge.

He knows about Wysteria.

If he were just my cousin, I wouldn't care, but after what Christopher told me. That something's up with Evan's dad, worry causes me to frown.

"What have you heard?"

He shakes his head and hands me back the cigarette. "Something about the fountain of youth?" He eyes me, looking for anything.

I turn away, out into the dazzling night. "She - " I close my eyes and remember all the times Wysteria was there for me growing up and the awful or not-so-awful fact that I love her.

I never had a mother, and with Wysteria around, I hardly missed her. At least not that much. Now that we're grown, it's not about the way she took care of me. It's about the hurt I see on her face. The way she tries to hide it, block it away, and it's my father's fault. If I were her, it'd be hard to be around me too. I must remind her of the man that destroyed her life.

But how do I fix it? I feel this undeniable need to take care of her. When we're together, it's like she's the Earth, and I'm bound to her by gravity. Even if I wanted to break away, I can't. There's something inside me, holding me to her.

"Dude." Evan shoves his shoulder into mine.

I run a hand through my hair. Open my eyes and stare at the vivid stars. I can't let anything happen to Wysteria. If that means I have to stay away from her, then I will.

"Is she the fountain of youth or not?" Evan flicks the dead cigarette from my fingers.

I watch it fall to the pavement below. "She isn't," I say simply, hoping he can't sense that I'm lying. We have the gift of sight with our elven heritage, though I haven't ever used it. Hell, I don't even know what it means. My dad refused to let me attend the Seven Magics Academy. Same with Evan's dad.

Evan nods. "If you say so, cousin." He laughs.

We punch each other a few times. Idiotic cousin slash brother junk and basically how we've always communicated. I take it easy on him, knowing I could kill him if I hit him too hard. Elven blood or not, immortality doesn't mean he can't die, just that he won't from natural causes.

"What is she then? Her parents always kept their heritage a secret. Elven blood, and what else? That's the question." Evan lights another cigarette.

"You seem way too interested in Wysteria," I say, but try and play it off as nonchalant. “Why do you care?”

He shrugs. “I don’t. I mean not really, except that she’s dating a member of my family, and I don’t want to see you get hurt.”

Wow, he’s on a roll tonight. The lies are thick. “Thanks, man, but I can take care of myself.”

“She plays the piano, too. I didn’t see that coming,” he continues as though I didn’t say anything.

I take another drag from his awful cigarette. “It was a shock to me too. Wysteria is special in so many ways. When I’m around her, I feel better, more alive than I have in a long time.” I try to appeal to the small part of him that might still have some compassion. But I don’t say more than that. He wouldn’t understand anyway.

He snorts. “I thought that’s what playing the piano did for you?”

I nod. “Yeah, it helps. But with her, it’s different. I finally feel - ” I stare at my hands. “Whole.” I laugh. “It sounds stupid. Even I know that.”

Evan takes back his cigarette and sucks in. He’s staring at me like I’ve grown three heads. “Sure, bro. Whatever.”

I slam my hands on the banister and straighten up. “Yeah, whatever. Hey, did you ever solve that problem with those guys?” I hadn’t seen them around in a while, and I hoped so. They were thugs. I had no doubt they would keep their promises unless Evan paid them. I wanted to ask him what it was about, but I refrained then, and I do now.

“It’s all good, cuz.”

“If you say so?” I go to my door. “Want to come in and have a beer?”

“Why not?” He follows me inside my apartment.

OceanofPDF.com

PARTY FACE

WYSTERIA

The rest of the week goes by in a blur of classes, homework, piano practice, more homework, hanging out with Sage, and sometimes Leva. Repeat. By Friday night, I'm exhausted.

Leva was called back to Sharra a couple of days ago on an important matter. She said she's coming back, and I hope it's sooner rather than later.

At the moment, all I want to do is fall asleep, but I've promised Sage I'll go to a party. Be her wing woman, which basically means I've got her back and will keep her out of trouble. I'm nervous about it. If she drinks too much, I don't know that I'll be able to stop her antics. But she has her magical stake, and I have mine in my jacket. Beyond that, she's sworn off doing spells for a while, so I need to make sure she doesn't have a need to give vampires fangs on their man parts.

Austin is going to meet us there. I've told him I need to focus on Sage, and he understands. He says he'll keep an eye on her too, especially since we're still waiting on Doug and Gary to retaliate.

"Are you ready?" I ask, only a little impatient to see Austin. The almost panic attack I had on our date was a fluke caused by being around his family. As long as we stay away from them, I'm perfectly okay around Austin. Better than okay. I want him. But he's been keeping me at arm's length.

Sage has changed her outfit for the sixth time. I've never seen her so undecided.

"Shit. I don't know what's wrong." She kicks off a pair of boots and doesn't put them back in their box.

I walk over. "Sage, what are you looking for?" I pat her knee.

She throws her hands in the air. “That’s the problem. I’m not sure.”

I walk to her closet and look through it. There’s a pair of jeans with the tags still on them. I pull them off the hanger. “What about these?”

“Gross. I won’t wear - ” She stops and grabs them. “Okay, why not.”

She rips off the tags and her black leggings. Tosses them on the floor. Then pulls on the jeans. They fit like a second skin, tight all the way down to her ankles. The black shirt she’s wearing fits snugly too and doesn’t cover all of her stomach, exposing her pierced belly button and her hipbones. She twirls in front of the mirror.

“I like it.” She runs over to a shoebox, flings it open, and pulls out her ankle boots, the same ones she wore the first night we went to a party.

“You look hot,” I say and mean it. Her choppy blond hair is spiked everywhere. Her eyes are lined, and her lips are reddened.

I’m wearing dark jeans, a form-fitting blue sweater, and my black ballet flats. My hair is pulled up in a high ponytail and braided down my back. I’ve put on some mascara and lip-gloss and have the bracelet with the carved bear on my right wrist. Each time I look at it, my heart warms. Christopher isn’t around much, but at least I know he’s thinking of me.

Sage grabs her purse, and my stomach churns. Now that I know what’s in there, what she’s going to do, I feel an unnatural hatred for her effing black purse. I want to make her stop, tell her she doesn’t need to do what I know she’s going to do, but I don’t.

“I’ll be back in a few. Party face. Put it on.” She points the edge of the purse at me.

I nod and try to smile.

Then she’s gone, and I collapse on the edge of my bed. There’s a new ache in my veins. It’s my worry for Sage. But I’m not sure what to say, how to make her stop doing what I know she shouldn’t. It can’t be good for her. I mean, any kind of drug, even the magical kind, can't be good for her. Plus, it's illegal.

A few minutes later, I hear her slide the card in the door and smile big. The door opens, and she puts her fists in the air. "Yay. Party face."

"Yay," I respond with pretend enthusiasm and stand.

"K. Here's the rules." She goes to the mirror and studies her reflection.

I join her and raise an eyebrow. "Rules?"

"No more than three drinks - the whole night. Lots of water. We stick by each other. No matter what. Deal?" She sticks up a hand like she wants me to high-five her.

I do. "Deal."

We head to the door. Sage looks me up and down. "Hey, you need a necklace."

"I don't have one," I answer, pulling the door open.

My mother always wore a silver locket. Inside was a picture of her and me and my dad. My aunt tried to recover it. Even talked to the police. But it was never found.

"Hang on," she says, walking over to her jewelry box. She opens it and lifts out a long silver chain with a bulbous heart on the end. She places it around my neck and lets it fall against my chest. "That's better."

"Thanks, Sage."

"Come on, Roomie. Let's go have some fun."

THE PARTY'S been going a while. I'm sitting on a large leather chair. Sage and I have followed our rules. I've had one shot. No more. Pleasant detachment meanders through my insides. Every time I see a drink, I want it. But I resist. Sipping water seems to help.

Sage is on her second. Right now, she's dancing with a cute guy.

He has thick brown hair. A nice body under his white shirt and navy cargo pants. On his feet are loafers. They tell me he's conceited but casual about it. He seems nice and into Sage, but I'm not a great judge of things guy related.

Austin hasn't come yet. I've texted multiple times, but he hasn't answered. And I wonder if he's going to. If maybe me asking him to be patient turned him off, and that's why he's been distant the last few days. Or it could be that I told him I loved him and then sort of backpedaled. I sigh. This loving and kissing and needing a guy is totally new to me. I can't help how I feel.

A laughing squeal forces my attention to a girl about to sit on the ratty green couch. It looks like the same one I saw at my first frat party. I wonder if they pass it from house to house, or if there was a giant sale on ugly green couches twenty years ago. As I'm watching, Doug appears and comes to sit on the arm of my chair. The guy reeks of too much cologne and not enough sense.

"Hello, Wysteria."

Slow anger builds in my stomach. I forgot my mother's jacket, which means I don't have my stake.

Stupid!

My anger shifts to Austin. He's supposed to be protecting me. At least that's what he told me. So, where is he?

"Hey yourself," I say, watching him watch Sage, a smirk on his boyish mouth, and I want to throw my knee into it. Make him bleed. I grit my teeth.

"Get the hell away from me," I seethe.

OceanofPDF.com

MY LITTLE SECRET

WYSTERIA

Doug looks at me, shocked. “Come on. Don’t be that way. I know you hooked up with Austin, and I know what he is.” He leans down and whispers in my ear. “He’s a vampire. I checked, and he’s unsanctioned, which means I have every right to kill him, especially since I’m sure he killed Gary. So, either you do whatever the hell I tell you to do, or I’ll turn that asshole to dust.”

My anger fizzles out and is replaced by fear. “Gary is dead?”

Doug searches my eyes. “Don’t act like you care, little bitch.” He takes a deep breath. “You smell like you’re in heat.”

“I made you a promise, and I always keep them,” I say, but make the mistake of looking right into his eyes.

“Get up,” he commands, using his compulsion and my inexperience against me.

My stomach turns with furious bile, but I find my body obeying. I’m out of the chair in an instant.

“Good girl.” He leans in, his teeth grazing my neck. “You really smell amazing.” He presses his lips to my rapidly beating vein.

“Get away from me,” I hiss, shoving against him with all my might and searching the room for Sage or Austin. I don’t see either of them.

“That isn’t how you talk to the man you love more than anything in the world, is it?” His brown eyes meet mine. “Especially when you’ll do whatever I say until the end of time. Now tell me you love me?”

I grind my teeth together as devastation fills my guts. Am I stuck doing his bidding forever because of his command?

“Tell me,” he shouts, grabbing me by the arm and shaking.

A couple of people look over at us, but only briefly until they laugh and move on with whatever they're doing. Someone sets off some magical fireworks, and the inside of the room fills with sparkling color.

"I love you," I say. But all I want to do is scrape the arrogant smile from his lips with my nails. Take his effing gold chain hanging from his neck and twist it until his head detaches. I want to -

"Here comes Austin. Repeat it. Tell me you love me, Wysteria."

"I love you." The words come out forced, but Austin hears them and flinches.

"Is this guy bothering you?" Austin grabs Doug by his collar and yanks him away.

"Hey, man. Watch the shirt. It cost six hundred bucks. That's probably more than you've ever seen all at once." Doug readjusts his ugly, too-fancy tee, glaring at Austin. "This isn't an Alpha Kai party, and I'm not a grunt tonight. You, on the other hand, will always be the poor son of a dirty cop." He grins. "Now, I'm going to take your girl and do things to her you only wish you could try."

Doug grabs me around the waist and whisks from the room. No one even looks twice. He's a registered vampire. Everyone knows that. Austin isn't. If he uses his speed, someone will report him, and then he could die.

I don't want that, but I still hope he at least tries to follow.

When Doug stops moving, I struggle to catch my breath. We're inside what appears to be an apartment, with a kitchen, living, and small dining room all in one area. In a lot of ways, it reminds me of Austin's place. "This is your apartment?" I verify.

"That's right." He grabs me by the arm and drags me down the hall and into a bedroom. It's dark and smells musty. "But not the one near Austin. This place is my little secret."

My heart sinks. How will Austin find me?

“Take off your clothes. I want easy access to your body,” he says, releasing me as he flips on the light and goes into the closet.

I can’t see what he’s doing, but I’m sure it isn’t anything good. With everything in me, I fight the compulsion. I can heal with a touch and reverse spells. Yet somehow, I can be compelled? It makes no sense. As I’m thinking such thoughts, I’m removing my shoes, my skirt, blouse, and the lovely heart necklace Sage gave me.

Doug didn’t specifically say to get naked, so I leave on my underwear and tank.

The room looks like a medieval dungeon. The carpet is gone, revealing concrete floors, and the walls are painted black. On the far wall hangs a thick wooden plank with restraints attached to it. Beneath, the floor is stained red. I’m guessing it is blood.

To the left is a small bed with only a metal frame and mattress. There’s blood all around it as well. Really, there’s blood everywhere, and I wince at thoughts of all he’s done in this room. Nothing good, I know that.

Doug closes the closet door and turns, his eyes raking over my body. In one hand is a small but deadly looking knife and in the other is a jar. He places it on a black desk leaning against the same wall as the closet. “Damn, but you’re fine. And so pure.” He inhales a deep breath. “I can smell the virginity on you, which surprises me since you’ve been so cozy with Austin.” A cruel smile lifts one side of his lips. “I may have to keep you alive longer than I promised.”

I want to run, but my feet won’t move. “Austin will find me. He won’t stop until he does. And then, he’ll kill you.” I lift my chin. “Unless I get the opportunity first.”

He’s suddenly got me around the neck and slams me against the wall, my head hitting the wood plank. Spots blind me a moment, and he uses the opportunity to place my arms in the manacles. “Let me go,” I whisper when my vision clears.

“Don’t speak and don’t move,” he says, slapping my face, pressing the sharp end of the blade against my cheek, but it doesn't draw blood.

That's the thing. Normal, human things have never been able to hurt me.

Leaning in, he scrapes his teeth down the other side. "I want to taste you so bad." He growls and grinds his teeth before stepping back. Then he looks at me and smiles. "They won't miss a little," he says and goes over to the table, dragging it and the jar so that it's under my right hand.

He removes the lid and adjusts it. Presses my open hand flat against the plank, revealing my wrist, and drags the blade across my skin.

My eyes widen, and I gasp in pain. I'm shocked it was able to cut into my flesh.

Doug notices and laughs. "This isn't a regular blade. It's been spelled by one of the originals and bathed in the blood of four human innocents." He rolls his eyes. "But really, what human is innocent? They all have sins, and death is well deserved regardless." Then he snorts. "Okay, they didn't have to die, but drinking from them, straight from the vein, after taking the blood I needed, well, that was a pleasure. It's how all vampires should live." His eyes become hard. "Our kind should be ruling this realm and all others. We are superior in every way. Yet, the vampire queen, Snow White works with humans." He spits. "What a waste. Soon though, things will change. I can promise you that." He moves in, pressing his body against mine.

OceanofPDF.com

DIE, DOUG, DIE

WYSTERIA

I whimper as tears fall onto my cheeks. I'm going to die. Why wasn't I more careful? Why didn't I listen to Christopher, Leva, or Snow White? I try desperately to turn my head away, so I can't see my blue blood falling like rain into the jar.

On my other wrist is the bracelet with the wooden bear, and I'd much rather focus on that. Austin said, having it would help Christopher find me. That gives me little hope. My brother left, and even with vampire speed, I doubt he'll get here in time before I've been drained.

Doug is still talking. "After I depleted those idiotic and easy humans, I found some unicorn blood. It seems someone had the forethought to save it for a time such as this." He grabs my face in one hand.

I try to hold my breath against the stench coming off him.

He smells of death as he licks my mouth, then licks my blood from the blade he holds. "Damn." His pupils dilate and flash red for the briefest moment before he licks the edge again and shudders. "Your blood is incredible." He cleans the knife and tucks it away before turning his attention to the jar filling with my blood.

He rushes over to the closet without a sound and grabs more jars, placing them on the table. "I can't bite into you. They don't want my venom to mix with your blood, but now I understand all the fuss surrounding you. "Your blood really can bring down nations." He laughs gleefully. "When I got the call that they'd found the fountain of youth, I thought it was a joke. Then they explained it was you. Since then, I've been trying to get my hands on you. That night at the heaven or hell party would've been perfect, but Austin stepped in. At the time, I didn't know he'd been turned. Someone broke supernatural laws for him. Tsk. Tsk. My employers know what he is now too. Things aren't going to end well for him, either."

I can't respond because of the compulsion, but if I can just touch him with my magic. Maybe I can heal all of the bad out of him.

Was such a thing possible? I never tried it.

When he moves to switch the jars, my fingers brush his hair, and they start to glow. I dig deep, searching for where he is broken and what needs restoration within him. My magic climbs into his mind, pushing open all the dark places, and there is a lot.

He was changed after a car crash.

I see him lying in the hospital bed. My brother standing over him as an elderly man speaks, his voice like acid.

"I don't care what your personal views of my government policies. Snow White sanctioned this, and you will comply," the man says.

Doug is seething. He hates the man who is his father. He doesn't want to live. But Christopher takes Doug's arm and bites. After that, things get hazy. When Doug opens his new vampire eyes, whatever goodness he still possessed is blackened out of him. The first thing he does is try and kill his dad. But the Supernatural Task Force is there and prepared. They capture him and bring him before Snow White. There is a brief conversation, and she gives him one more chance. That was six months ago. He hadn't tried to kill anyone, but he had been hurting people like Sage.

Doug steps back, gasping, and slaps me again. "Stop that," he commands.

With our connection broken, my magic pulls back. But I've seen enough. There is no good in him. Becoming a vampire boosted the worst in him. With his new abilities, he encouraged and nurtured the most depraved parts of himself until everything good in him was blinked into oblivion.

"You'll pay for that," he says, his hands roaming my body as he kisses my neck and my chest.

Fresh tears leak down my cheeks. He grabs hold of my thighs, his gaze on me. But suddenly, he lets go. A look of disbelief crosses his face, and his smile vanishes as he sinks to the ground.

Standing before me is my roommate. Sage. I try to say her name, but I'm still under Doug's compulsion.

Her eyes are blank like she sees ghosts. In one hand is a bloody stake. "I killed him," she whispers and then bends over and retches.

I want to tell her that it isn't true. Doug will recover, and that's dangerous, but my lips won't move.

"He isn't dead yet." Austin unexpectedly enters the bedroom. His eyes are wild as he takes me in. "Hang on," he growls, then pulls a large, slightly curved blade from under his shirt and goes over to Doug.

My head is dropped forward, and I watch horrified as Austin takes Doug by the hair on his head, lifts him slightly, exposing his neck, and - .

"The head. That's right," Sage says, her eyes haunted but relieved.

I make a noise, desperate to tell Austin to stop. I don't want to witness Doug's death.

Without mercy, Austin slices the blade through Doug's neck. A few drops of Doug's blood strike my face. It's warm and sticky. My insides start to quake. And it's like I'm reliving my parents' deaths all over again.

"You really killed him," Sage says, dropping her stake. She notices when it clangs to the floor, and she quickly picks it up, tucking it in her back pocket.

As soon as Doug's head is separated from his body, the compulsion is gone. "Sage. Austin," I whisper, but it comes out more like a whine. Another panic attack is coming on, and it's going to be a doozy. I hate that I'm so weak.

“He deserved it,” Sage says, wiping her mouth with the back of her hand. She comes over and works to loosen the restraints. My blood is still dripping into the jar freely. “Shit, how do I stop you from bleeding?” She presses her hand over my wound and closes her eyes a moment. “Omangus Orithe Wyterithe.” Though my blood has oozed between her fingers, I feel the cut on my wrist healing. Sage doesn’t let go until it's completely done. She opens her eyes and steps back, looking at her bloodied hand like it’s a foreign object.

Austin is still dealing with Doug’s body. It’s already beginning to decay, and I return my focus to Sage. “Thank you,” I say softly.

She wrenches her gaze from her hand and looks at me. “I don’t know how I did it.” Her hand starts to glow like there’s a lightbulb under her skin. It’s golden and gets brighter and brighter, and then it’s gone.

Not only that, but the blood covering her hand has disappeared too.

Sage’s mouth drops open. “Your magic is beyond scary,” she says and then smiles. “But, I feel great.” She tries to free me again.

“Good,” I say and try to smile, knowing it's probably an effect from my blood. I don’t feel great. I feel woozy and weak. There are nearly two quarts of my blood in those jars.

When Doug’s body is nothing but ash, Austin comes over to me. “I’ve got you,” he says softly and yanks off the restraint. My body falls into him, but he doesn’t stop until my other hand is free. Then he pulls me into a hug. “Let’s get you out of here.” He lifts me into his arms.

“What about her blood?” Sage asks.

OceanofPDF.com

A MEETING WITH THE DRAGON

WYSTERIA

Austin looks freaked, like he's unsure what to do. "Wys needs it. It isn't like my blood, or your blood will help her." He looks around the room. "Take the jars outside. Put them someplace safe. I'll put Wys into your car, and then I'm going to burn this place to the ground." Each word comes out slowly, decisively. "No one can know what happened here."

I cling to Austin, but now that I'm safe, I'm so tired. "You two are the best," I say and close my eyes, sinking into dark oblivion.

The smell of smoke fills my nose, telling me Austin did precisely as he said he would. I try to wake, but there's a part of me that's desperate to stay in the shadows. I feel sure nothing can hurt me here. Still, I weave in and out of consciousness, sometimes catching what's going on around me.

"Can you call your grandfather?" Austin asks.

"I - yes, but you don't understand what you're asking of me." Sage's voice is filled with anguish.

"She's worth it. Please. Abernathy is the only one who can help."

"Fine, but we need someplace private, away from people. The dragon has become more and more reclusive over the years."

"I'll drive."

"WHAT DO WE HAVE HERE?"

The voice filters through my consciousness so I feel it in my bones. At the same time, a sudden wind whips against my skin and brings with it the smell of sulfur.

"This is Wysteria. She is the fountain of youth, and she is my friend," Sage says.

My heart warms at her words. She and I have come a long way since the day we became roommates.

"Granddaughter, it is lovely to see you again. I've missed our talks," the gruff voice says.

Sage doesn't say anything, but I hear a deep chuckle.

"Still stubborn, like your father, I see. Very well. What would you have me do?"

"Hello, Abernathy. My name is Austin. Thank you for coming," Austin says. My heart warms at the sound of his voice. He's frightened, I can hear it, but he's also beyond brave. "This is Wysteria's blood."

I hear the liquid sloshing in the jars as he moves them.

"Is there any way you can put it back inside her?" Austin continues. "She's weak, and I'm worried she'll die."

"This is why you woke me from my slumber?" Abernathy asks.

"Yes," Sage and Austin say at the same time.

"Will you help her or not?" Sage asks. She's huffy. Arrogant. The dragon is her grandfather. My behavior would be much different if he were mine.

"Of course. But Sage, my darling girl, you could've helped her. If only you hadn't shunned your family." Abernathy waits a moment. When Sage doesn't respond, he heaves a giant breath. "Very well. I'll need a few moments alone with your friend."

"Fine," Sage says.

"Leave the blood, Austin. Return in five minutes," Abernathy adds.

"I will. Thank you." I feel a slight breeze and know he and Sage are gone, leaving me alone with the dragon.

"Wake, Wysteria."

There is a slight pressure against my forehead. My eyes spring open, and I'm staring into the face of an enormous and beautiful dragon. I gasp but don't move.

"You heard everything?"

"I-I think so," I say, my voice sounding hoarse. An image of Doug's severed head fills my mind. Followed by the memory of my parents lying on the living room floor in their blood. So much death. I hate it.

He blows out a breath, sending smoke into my face. "Your life hasn't been easy. I see that. Still, you have much left to do. Are you ready?"

The weight of his words settles on my shoulders. "What am I supposed to do?"

"The elven kingdom is in peril, and the king must be stopped," Abernathy begins.

"How do you know this?" I interrupt. "Didn't you just say you were asleep?"

He chuckles, sending tendrils of smoke into my face.

"I'm an original," Wysteria. "Created not long after the Unknowns. Without any effort on my part, I know everything." He curls his long tail around his paws. "Now then, you must destroy Redyrin and save the elven kingdom." His big golden eyes soften. "You have royal elven blood in your veins, and though it doesn't seem so, you must become the ruler of that realm."

My head is spinning. He knows so much about me. Not only that, but why would he think I should rule the elven realm? "I just want to live a normal life. Play the piano. Go to college. I'm not any kind of ruler." Austin seems more befitted for such a task. Or even Sage. Not me.

He lifts his head and moves back, sitting on his haunches. He's enormous and golden and beautiful. His lovely mane reminds me of a lion's while his eyes study me like he's seeing into my soul. "Ease and normalcy are not your destiny, Wysteria. Stop hiding and start fulfilling your purpose."

“Why would you think I should rule the elven realm?” That seems ridiculous. “My parents told me about my heritage. Never once did they mention royalty.”

“Perhaps they didn’t know, but your ancestor is the elven king, Devoran.” Abernathy smiles, revealing his pointy white teeth. “Which makes you related to the vampire queen, Snow White.” He licks his lips and watches me, waiting for the information to sink in.

“That can’t be.” I’m blown away. Is such a thing possible? Is the dragon speaking the truth? He has no reason to lie, I think, answering my own question.

“It’s true. Devoran fathered many children throughout his long life. You are from one of those lines.” Abernathy blows smoke out of his nose. “The elf on the throne now is there through deception. His family has no royal blood, but he killed the rightful king and stole his place. Over the years, he’s killed or banished anyone who might threaten him, but you, Wysteria Hart, are the rightful heir.”

“I - it’s just - ” I’m not sure what to say. “So, I’m not going to die?” I ask, changing the subject.

He chuckles as he shakes his head. One of his scales flies off of his head and lands at my feet. I pick it up. It’s hot to the touch, and I drop it.

“Definitely not," he says. "Your body is like any other. It will replenish. If you wish, I can take your blood for myself. In return, I will give you something.”

I lift an eyebrow. “But you said Sage could fix me. Was that a lie?"

"Not necessarily. There is a spell she could've used to help you regain your strength more quickly." He blinks. "Now, your blood." He eyes the jars.

I shrug, moving into a more comfortable position. "Sure. It’s yours.” Then stand and carefully carry both jars over to Abernathy.

When I’m close enough, he bends down, reminding me of a giant cat, and sniffs. Then speaks words I don’t understand. The blood in the jars turns to jelly and lifts out of each container, traveling to the dragon's open mouth.

"Tastes like blue raspberry gummy worms," he says and makes a noise almost like purring as he smacks his lips.

"Uh, yum, I guess?" What can I say in response to that?

He leans down, so we're face to face. Then whispers more incomprehensible words. As he speaks, gray smoke swirls between us before it circles into me.

"What's happening?" I look down at myself, unsure what I expect to see.

"Don't be afraid. Just wait," the dragon says calmly.

The smoke continues to churn a few more moments, and then it's gone.

"See, that didn't hurt, did it?" he asks kindly.

OceanofPDF.com

CHOCOLATE MUFFIN

WYSTERIA

“What did you do?” I check myself and my clothes. Nothing seems different.

“Not only is your elven blood royal, but so is your unicorn blood. And with that blood, comes the gift to commune with your ancestors - dead and alive.”

I gasp, and my eyes get wide. “Like my parents?”

“If that is your wish, then yes. But with such a gift, you must remember that the dead may not want to communicate with you. So be patient.” He yawns, causing a wisp of smoke to exit his mouth.

“How do I speak with them?” I search inside myself for whatever Abernathy awakened or did that will allow such a thing to be possible.

“Think about the dead ancestor you wish to speak with. Hold them and all you know of them in your mind. If they are willing, they will come to you.” He scratches his mane with one of his paws. “Now, then. Tell me about my granddaughter. How is she doing in college?”

The abrupt change, along with what he’s said about the dead, has me spinning. “Sage is doing fine.” I pause. “College is a lot harder than either of us thought it would be, but she’s doing better than most, I think.”

“You’re a good friend, Wysteria Hart. I’m glad the two of you are roommates. You’re good for each other.” He lifts his head and stands. “It was lovely to make your acquittance. Goodbye.” His wings beat several times, and he lifts into the air.

I’m surprised he didn’t wait for Sage, but it makes sense anyway. She didn’t seem happy to see him.

I SIT UP WITH A START. The sun is beating through my bedroom window. For a split second, I think I'm late for class. Then I remember it's Saturday. The clock on the nightstand says nine sixteen.

Sage is asleep in her bed, her hands tucked under her face.

Peaceful, I think, noticing how soft her features are without all the stress and worry etched in them.

I lay back down as thoughts about last night come to mind. It was bonkers. Doug compelling me. Sage staking him. Austin killing him. Meeting a real live dragon. Just another supernatural day in the human realm, I think.

There's no corpse, of course. As soon as Doug died, his body turned to ash. The compulsion left my head. It was a relief, but I can't get over that Austin killed him like he worked for the Supernatural Task Force. And maybe he does. I'm really not sure of anything anymore. After that, he burned the building to the ground. I didn't see it, but that's what he said he was going to do, and I believe him.

When Sage and Austin returned, it was just me sitting in the open field. They asked what happened, and I gave them details. Not much was said after that. The three of us needed time to ourselves for different reasons.

I slide out of bed, pick up my shower bag, and quietly leave the dorm room, heading to the communal bathroom. Leaning against the sink, I stare at my reflection.

Two other girls enter the bathroom just then. Talking and laughing like it's the best day ever. I say hello, and they respond in kind, but I can't stop staring at my reflection. And that's when I notice something dried in my hair. Something red.

Blood, I think, and rush to an empty shower stall and turn on the water. I wash my hair twice, then once more for good measure, to make sure I get it all out.

"Wysteria! Wysteria!" Sage screams, her voice echoing inside the bathroom.

I poke my head out. “What’s wrong?” My heart is racing at the fear in her voice.

She heaves a sigh of relief. “You scared the crap out of me. I woke, and you were gone. Why aren’t you still asleep?”

The two girls in the bathroom with me decide they’re finished and bolt. One glances at Sage, and I stifle a smile. Sage is scary. I’m glad she’s on my side.

“What are you looking at? Get out of here!” Sage flips her off.

The other girl lets out an offended huff before exiting.

“I’m almost done. Be there in a sec.” I let the water cascade over my body.

“Fine, but hurry. I’m hungry.”

She hasn’t said a word about her grandfather or what happened at Doug’s place since we got home yesterday. Not that I blame her.

“For cafeteria food? Or Perky’s?” I shout over the running water.

Sage rarely eats - ever. Especially not breakfast. When she does eat, it’s usually pastries from the coffee shop, Perky’s. I don’t think she’s ever eaten in the cafeteria.

She seems to understand my curiosity. “It’s not like I have anything against cafeteria food.” She crosses her arms and pops a hip.

“So, cafeteria then?”

“Why not?” She shrugs. “It could be fun.” She throws up her hands and shakes her head.

There’s something other than the fact that she stabbed Doug going on with her. It's like she's happy and I just didn't realize it because that emotion coming from her is rare. “This is about a guy,” I say, turning off the water, wrapping my hair in a towel, and putting on my bathrobe.

She laughs. “No, it isn’t. Why would you say that?” She studies me like I’m a science experiment in the biology lab.

I raise my eyebrows, determined not to let her ask if I'm okay again. Because I am. More or less. I'd much rather focus on her. "The guy you were dancing with last night? What's his name?"

She closes herself inside a toilet stall.

I walk over to a sink. Apply some face lotion before rubbing the towel through my hair. There's mascara residue under my eyes. I use cream and the end of a cotton swab to remove it. Apply some lip balm.

Sage comes out and washes her hands. I walk over and catch her eyes in the mirror's reflection. "Come on, Sage, tell me his name."

"Fine. His name is Romney. Before I had to get all kick-ass on Doug, he and I were having the best time."

"Sorry, I interrupted," I say, playing with my hair. "How did you find me?" I can't help that question.

"My heart necklace. I put a locator spell on it."

"I - That's brilliant." Then I shake my head. "You were afraid I was going to leave you again?"

She laughs though it isn't cheerful. "Something like that."

"And then you told Austin where I was."

"Exactly." She leans against the sink and watches me. "You really are okay, aren't you?"

I force myself not to sigh. "Great," I say and give her one of my own not cheerful smiles. "So, you gonna meet Romney in the cafeteria?"

She flicks me in the face with water. "Not if you don't get your butt dressed." She walks away and pushes open the bathroom door. I collect my stuff and trail behind her.

"Is he supernatural?" I whisper.

In our room, I dress, and grab my meal card.

Sage does the same, and we make our way over to the elevator.

She still hasn't answered me, but I get it. Even though the school is full of supernatural students, it’s not really talked about. At least not that I’ve heard.

When we reach the cafeteria, we get in line. Get our food and then Sage finds us a free table, where we sit.

"Come on, Sage. Give me details. Is he sup—"

“Maybe,” she says, watching me slather a piece of toast with butter. The cafeteria is packed and noisy, but Sage and I are in our own little bubble.

“You don’t know, or you don't want to say?”

In answer, she breaks off a piece of her chocolate muffin and puts in in her mouth.

OceanofPDF.com

DESTINY WILL FIND ME

WYSTERIA

"If you know, tell me." I take a bite of my scrambled eggs.

“I'm not sure. We haven’t discussed our DNA yet.” She picks at the muffin, taking one of the chocolate chips and putting it in her mouth.

“See him yet?” I can’t help but be amused. This is a side of her I haven’t seen before. She’s usually so uninterested. But her knee is bouncing up and down. She’s nervous. Antsy.

Sage shakes her head. “No. Stop nagging me.”

I cover a smile behind my napkin. “I’m going to go get some bacon. Want anything?”

“No.”

I choke on a laugh.

The bacon is in the same area as the eggs, waffles, pancakes, and hash browns. The line is long, but I don’t mind waiting. It allows me to think about what happened last night. How I almost died. What Doug said about Austin. I need to talk to him.

“It’s Wysteria, right?” Someone taps me on the shoulder.

I turn and am face to face with the girl from the night I ran into Austin. She’s wearing a cheerleader uniform. I think that explains a lot. Or, maybe that's too judgmental.

“Yep.” The line is moving, and I go with it.

“Did he make you feel special?” Her eyes twinkle with maniacal glee like she knows all my secrets.

My face scorches with mortification, and I’m not even sure why. “No,” I whisper, keeping my eyes down.

She giggles. “I think he did,” she says. “And, I think you liked it.”

I look up, ignoring the rapid beating of my heart. It isn't that I'm afraid of her. Hardly. It's only that she's confirming the rumors about Austin making the rounds with other girls. "It's none of your business," I say, swallowing down some of my irritation.

"Okay," she says, shrugging. "But if you ever feel like talking, I'm available."

"Got it." I offer a silent plea she'll leave without getting whatever food she's after. She keeps her place behind me, and I want to scream. I finally reach the bacon, but it's gone. Not wanting to leave empty-handed, I put a waffle on my plate. Pour syrup over it and head back to the table.

Romney, the guy Sage is gaga about, is sitting with her. They seem to be deep in conversation. He's holding her hand, stroking it with his thumb.

Aww, I think, knowing I can't interrupt them. My toast is still sitting on the table, but I'm abandoning it. Sage and Romney need their privacy. I search the crowded cafeteria looking for someplace else to sit, but everything is full, and I don't know anyone. The cheerleaders are seated at the long table with a bunch of people. They keep glancing my way and whispering.

"Come on. You can sit with me." It's Austin, abruptly at my side. He's got a tray piled high with food in his hands.

Suddenly the world feels right. He heads over to another small table. Two guys are already sitting there. When they see Austin, they grab their trays and bolt. Austin sits and then waves me over.

As I'm sitting, he says, "Glad to see you all cleaned up."

"You too," I say, trying to avoid thinking about the way he sliced Doug's head off like it's an everyday occurrence for him.

"Thanks." He touches my hand. "You ready to talk about last night?"

I knew he would ask me this, so I'm prepared. "Doug said that whoever he's working for knows you're a vampire and wants to kill you too."

"I'm not surprised." His face gets serious. "What else?"

"Abernathy told me I'm supposed to stop trying to be normal and start living up to my potential." I cut into my waffle, but don't take a bite.

"And what does he think you should be doing?" Austin looks at his food but doesn't eat it. Just scoots it around on his plate. Then picks up a bagel but doesn't move it to his mouth.

I can't help the harsh breath and determine right then and there that I won't tell him what Abernathy said about me being heir to the elven kingdom's throne or that I'm related to Snow White. That just seems so wrong. But I can tell him everything else. "He said something about saving a kingdom - " I pause, trying to remember all his words. "And that I must destroy Redyrin," I finish.

Austin's eyes widen. "So, not a whole lot," he says sarcastically and drops his uneaten food. "Did Abernathy tell you where to start?"

I shake my head, putting my hands in my lap. "Nope, but I have an idea."

"Oh?" He leans in. "I'm listening."

I tell him about the gift Abernathy gave me after consuming my blood. About how I can speak with my dead ancestors.

"You're kidding me?" Austin isn't convinced.

I shake my head. "It's true. At least I think so. I wanted to try and summon my parents and ask them what they think," I whisper.

"When will you do that?" His eyes bore into me.

I hope he isn't weirded out by this turn of events. Between my being the fountain of youth and now possibly being able to talk to the dead, I might be weirded out if the roles were reversed.

"Wys?" he prods.

I know I should say I'm going to try immediately, especially if I'm supposed to rule the elven kingdom and destroy Redyrin. The prospect is scary, though, too. What if I try to talk with my parents and they don't respond? I'm not sure I'm ready for the rejection. "Soon," I say.

His features change. "Whatever you decide, it'll be okay. Plus, I wouldn't worry about what some old dragon said. He's been alive so long, he probably doesn't know what he's saying."

I want to believe him, but I don't think it matters one way or another. Sooner or later, my destiny will find me.

Instead of focusing on my problems and possible solutions, I turn my attention to the mess Austin is in. "Do you think someone will discover what you did to Doug?" I ask, looking down at my plate.

"They already know. I told Christopher. He's taking the news to Snow White, and she'll bring what I did before the council."

"What about you being an unsanctioned vampire?" I clear my throat.

"I have a feeling there will be consequences, but it doesn't matter. I wouldn't change what I did."

"Did you kill Gary the same way you killed Doug?" I ask, curious about whether I care or not.

He's surprised by the question. "No." Then he looks at me, his eyes intent. "That's a promise, Wys. I haven't killed anyone but Doug."

"Okay," I say and believe him.

He proceeds to kiss each of my fingertips.

I'm tingling everywhere and shyly meet his eyes. "Before last night, I got the feeling you were avoiding me. That I did something to make you mad."

Austin turns over my hand and places a kiss in the center, sending a wave a desire right through me and down to my toes. "No. I wasn't mad. At least not at you," he says seductively.

"Who are you mad at then?" I ask, but all I can think about is being in his arms. Now that I know he isn't mad, I need him - want him. Anything to forget about Doug and all that transpired.

OceanofPDF.com

“Myself,” he admits.

“Why?” I’m so confused.

He leans back in his chair. His face is unreadable. “What did the girl in line have to say?”

He’s changing the subject, but that’s okay. Whatever his reason, I can tell it’s serious. “N-Nothing,” I say, but I feel the heat rising into my face.

Austin crosses his arms. “That you’re blushing tells me that isn’t true.”

I look away, spinning the fork in the syrup still on my plate. There’s no way I’m telling him what she said. I’d sooner die a horrible death than repeat it.

He rests his chest against the table. I feel it give slightly under his weight. “Your silence speaks volumes, Wysteria.”

I glance at him through my lashes. His ice-blue eyes stake me through the heart. He licks his bottom lip and runs a hand through his hair. He’s beautiful. Sexy. My face gets hotter. It seems we’re both avoiding our problems, and I’m okay with that.

“Talk to me,” he whispers, playing with my hand.

I want to. I want to look him in the eyes and tell him. But not here. “Can we go somewhere? Want to practice our duet?” My “go-to” place.

He smiles. “It’s Saturday.”

“And?”

He shrugs. “All right. Let’s go.”

We stand together. Drop off our trash and head toward the exit.

I glance at the table where Sage and I were sitting. She isn't there, and neither is Romney. I pull out my phone to text her and see she's already texted me.

Her message says: I'm spending the day with Romney. Catch you later.

I text back: Be safe.

She responds: Don't worry. He likes sobriety. I may get my first real kiss.

That is a pleasant surprise. I reply: Awesome. Can't wait to hear all about it.

"What?" Austin asks, glancing over my shoulder.

"Sage. She's," I pause. "It's nothing. Roommate stuff." I won't betray her secret, not even to Austin.

He gives me a confused look.

"Trust me. It's just girl stuff."

"Alright." Austin smiles and wraps his arms around my waist from behind. I lean into him, enjoying the scent of him.

"Get a room," the girl who talked to me in the food line shouts.

I feel Austin's body tense.

"Let's get out of here," I say and wink, hoping he'll relax. It works because he takes my hand, and we walk out of the cafeteria together.

WE PRACTICE our duet for thirty minutes. I'm having a hard time concentrating. I thought as soon as we got in the music room, Austin would demand I tell him what the girl said. He didn't. Instead, we go to work. The duet is sounding great. Austin plays with such emotion. Sometimes I think my heart will break with the passion radiating from as he plays each note.

Austin looks at me. Smiles. "Had enough?"

I have, but I don't want to leave this room. When we're here, together, it's like nothing else matters. There's only the music and us.

“I guess,” I finally say.

“Come here.” He quirks a finger at me.

It’s the hottest damn thing I’ve ever seen. Walking is a challenge because my legs are suddenly shaky.

He pats the spot next to him on the piano bench. I sit, my heart dancing with anticipation.

“Play me something,” he says, his eyes on me.

“Okay.” I swallow and lift my hands to the keys. There’s a song I’ve been working on. It’s simple. The right-hand plays broken chords while the left keeps the beat. As I’m playing, thoughts of Austin kissing and biting me fills my mind, and my face warms. When the last note is finished, Austin places a hand over mine.

“That’s beautiful. You’re beautiful, Wysteria.”

“It’s still a work in progress,” I respond, enjoying a contented glow at his compliments.

“You’re blushing again. What were you thinking about while you were playing?” He takes my hand cups it in both of his. At that moment, I feel treasured. It’s unusual and has me tingling inside.

I take a deep breath. Time to spill. “I was thinking about you and me kissing and about what if felt like when you drank from me.” As I speak, my face gets hotter. I’m too embarrassed to look at him, but I’m so glad I said it. Got it out there.

“The kissing I like, but the other part?” Austin releases me and starts to play chords on the piano. Major and then minor.

I study him then. His features are filled with an odd sadness, his jaw clenches as he focuses on the keys.

“Biting me wasn’t a good thing?” I ask, curious about his reaction. I remember the way he looked after, as though he’d experienced something extraordinary. That had made me happy - glad my blood tasted so good to him.

Austin wipes a hand over his face. “Your blood is - ” He doesn’t finish.

“What?” I’m confused and incredibly vulnerable. It’s uncomfortable letting so much of my guard down, but he did say he loved me. And I did say I loved him back. According to my mother, that means you can share everything with that person. She said she did with my dad.

I clear my throat. There’s no reason to backpedal. “My blood didn’t taste good?” I stumble over the words.

His features soften. “It tasted better than good. Your blood is filled with magic. It changed me.” He lowers his voice. “Wys, I don’t know if you know this, but your blood changes the very makeup of a creature. My vampirism is heightened. All of my abilities are stronger. Not only that, but your blood gave me another ability too.” He stops playing and wraps an arm around me., pulling me against his chest.

I’m shaken. Of course, I know I’m the fountain of youth. My brother told me. I also know my magic kept Redyrin looking young and beautiful, but to add powers? “What’s the ability?” I ask, speaking softly.

“I can sense a person’s emotions,” he says, brushing a wayward piece of hair from off my face.

I look at him, trying to read what he’s thinking. “You couldn’t do that before?”

“No.”

I swallow, wondering if he can sense how exposed I am. “What can you sense about me?”

“You’re feeling nervous, and - ” He tilts his head to one side, biting his bottom lip. “You want me.”

"Yeah, pretty much," I say, pushing him away playfully. Concentrate on my hands like they can provide comfort somehow. “But anyway, that’s bad?”

Austin straightens. “Kind of. Because your blood tastes divine. It’s like drinking from you makes me whole." He looks away, and I watch a shudder run through him. "I'm afraid if I drink from you again, I might not stop."

He's worried he'll kill me. "I'm sorry," I say, feeling stupid, especially since I really want him to go all vampire on me right now.

"Why are you sorry?" Austin runs a hand through his hair. "I'm the one who should be sorry. And that's why I kept my distance. Because I'm not. I'm - " He looks at me, and I see the pain in his expression. "I don't know whether I can control myself around you. When I'm not with you, I'm always thinking about you. And when I am with you, it's all I can do not to kiss you and more."

OceanofPDF.com

I'M NOT AFRAID

WYSTERIA

"Oh." I stand and walk over to my piano, take my music, and pick up my bag. "I definitely don't want to cause you any pain." I shake my head. "As the fountain of youth, I'm supposed to be able to heal and provide hope. Not. Ugh." I shake my head again, frustrated, and start for the door. Before I reach it, I look back. "For what it's worth, I believe you can control yourself around me and I trust you more than I've ever trusted anyone," I whisper.

"Hey." Austin is immediately at my side. "Don't go."

My heart races at his nearness. He is a vampire. Would I be able to stake him if he tried to drink me dry? Would I even want to? My knees quake. Probably neither. "Why?"

"We still need to practice." He tucks his hands into his pockets.

"Maybe we should be done for today," I say nervously, my eyes searching his. I'm not afraid, but my instincts tell me I should be.

Austin wraps a hand around my neck, strokes it softly with his thumb, sending shivers through my body. It's like he's playing with fire, and he likes it. "I don't want you to go," he says huskily.

"Austin." I say his name softly as need rises in my heart.

His eyes are hooded as he grabs my thick braid and wraps it around his hand, gently pulling my head back, so I'm looking up at him, my throat exposed.

I gasp, thinking I should run or grab the stake from my backpack. At the same time, I don't care because I want to feel what I did the last time he drank from me. "Go ahead," I say.

Pain fills his features as he opens his mouth, flashing his fangs.

My heart is ratcheting at super speed, and I lick my lips. Whatever happens, I'm glad it's with Austin. There's no one else but him. It doesn't matter that I haven't dated anyone else. Nor does it matter than he's the only man I've kissed. He is my everything.

Austin releases my hair, and I think he's going to walk away. Instead, he tugs me to him, resting his forehead on my shoulder. My face is near his neck now, and I smell his clean cologne with hints of cedarwood and amber. There's heat coming off his skin, and I press my head against his neck, nudging him, telling him with my body, I'm all in.

"I want you, Wys," he says, his voice gruff, and it sounds like he confessing his sins.

I drop my bag and music, letting them fall to the floor. My hands go under his shirt, desperate to be near him. "You have me," I say, kissing his neck, licking it, the way I want him to do to me. Then I open my mouth and bite, ever so gently, suckling and tasting his skin with my tongue, wondering if I can mark his skin. I'm the one playing with fire, not the other way around. But I don't care. I want to be burned. Scorched until I don't know where he ends and I begin.

Austin's grip tightens on my waist, and he groans softly, kissing my neck, pulling my collar out of the way, and scraping his fangs against my skin. "You're killing me, Wys."

"Not having you close is killing me." My hands are still under his shirt, and I tug at his pants, asking him to do what he and I both want.

He lets out a breath, the heat of it against my skin. His fangs pierce slowly, ever so slowly, and I moan as desire sinks low in my belly. That pushes him over the edge, and he sinks them all the way in, so they're buried.

I cry out, my nails digging into his back. "That's it," I say. When he begins to suck, I lose myself. It feels so good.

Too soon, he pulls back, flinging himself away from me, bumping into the piano. The lid falls, filling the room with a musical noise. He's breathing heavily and bends over, putting his hands on his knees. "I can't."

The wound on my neck is still open, and I feel my blood trickling down between my breasts. I press my shirt against the holes. "Austin," I say, distressed that this is so hard for him.

He looks up, and his eyes get wide. "Damn." He comes back over and licks the wound, closing it. "See, I'm the one who should be sorry." His eyes are so full of pain.

"No," I say, taking his hands. "I wanted you to do that. I - it's my fault." I look at our hands together a moment. My blood is on my fingers, and it smears into his, like a blood oath. "Do you still love me?"

"More than anything," he says, taking my face in his hands and kissing me.

There's a tumult of emotions rattling through my insides, but the strongest is my need for him.

"Then kiss me," I say, meeting his gaze, begging that he'll do as I ask.

His hands cup my face, and his mouth covers mine.

I pour all my love into my kiss, hoping I'm enough for him.

He returns my need, lifting me, so I wrap my legs around his hips. When I flick my tongue inside his mouth, I find his fangs and stroke them briefly before diving in deep. Delicious tension fills my belly, and the ache takes my breath away.

His kisses are desperate, fierce, and hungry. I match his urgency, kiss for kiss. He's mine, and I never want to let him go.

He walks us backward to the piano bench where he sits. It's obvious he wants to take our kissing to the next level, but someone could walk in at any moment. So we kiss and kiss some more. His hands under my shirt. Stroking my skin until it's on fire.

Many, many minutes later, we slow, our kisses turning tender and needy. My lips are swollen as he suckles my bottom lip, and I sigh.

“That was - You are - ” I trail off, unsure how to express all I’m feeling at this moment.

Austin’s face is serious. “I’m a vampire,” he says, and I hear the mourning in his voice.

“I don’t care,” I say. “I love you.”

Even as I say the words, a memory of my parents planning a hunting trip to slay a group of vampires fills my mind. When they think I’m sleeping, they discuss how they’ll kill all of them. My parents didn’t have a high opinion of vampires, but they might change their minds if they knew Austin became one. At least I hope so. Either way, I can’t change how I feel about Austin.

He helps me to my feet. My legs are wobbly, and waves of yearning still shoot through my belly.

“Wysteria, you’re the most amazing person I’ve ever known.” His voice is filled with tender astonishment as his eyes linger on my mouth.

“And you love me too,” I say, hopeful.

“Yes,” he admits, but there’s still dejection.

“So, what’s wrong?” I lift his face so I can see his eyes.

“I don’t deserve you,” he says, resting his hands on my hips, his body telling me he wishes that wasn’t true.

“You deserve me as much as I deserve you.” I’m starting to feel frightened by the way he’s acting. We are meant to be together. He has to know that.

He nods, pulling me into a hug. “What are you doing tomorrow?”

“I have to study for a test,” I say, wondering what he’s getting at. “But that’s it.”

He grinds his teeth together and pushes me back so I can see his features shift from despondency into happiness. As though he’s decided I’m right for him after all. “Can I cook you dinner at my place?”

My face lights up. “What time?”

“I’ll pick you up at six.”

OceanofPDF.com

THE DEATH SQUAD

CHRISTOPHER

“Snow White, it’s an honor to see you again.” I bow before the queen of the vampires.

“We’ve known each other long enough. You don’t need to call me by my full name, Hunter.” She gives me a wry smile. “Snow is fine.” She’s sitting behind a massive ebony desk. The top is sleek and so shiny I can see her reflection in it.

“Very well.” I stand with my arms behind my back, studying the woman I marked so long ago. A lot has changed over the years. At one point, I believed myself in love with her. I think she felt the same for a time. Until her true love revealed himself. Then I betrayed her and broke her trust.

As repayment, one of the original vampires, Sharra, killed me. Snow could’ve left me to die, but she didn’t. She saved me. For that, I owe her everything, including my allegiance. But it wasn’t until her daughter, Jasmine, that I finally became the vampire I’m meant to be.

Though I am still working through issues. Like, even now, as I watch her, watching me, I can’t help thinking of her blood. The way I drank from her and the way she reciprocated. It was the same with her daughter. In a lot of ways, I have been nothing more than a means to an end.

Someday, I hope to change that. To find my own happily ever after. But that time isn’t now.

“Have you heard from Jasmine?” I ask, breaking the silence between us.

She flinches, and I immediately regret asking. “Not in a while, but I’m certain my daughter and her husband can take care of themselves," she snaps, throwing down her pen, and rising, coming around the desk, so we are only a few feet apart.

"You're right, of course," I say, crossing my arms.

Her features relax. "It's difficult when children grow up and leave the nest." She walks over to one of the many bookshelves lining her grand office and pulls down a book, flipping through the pages. "Jasmine made a much better ambassador than I do, but c'est la vie." She rolls her shoulders back. "I've called you here to discuss Austin."

"What about him?" I'm immediately on my guard. I've come to care about the boy, especially since my sister loves him so much.

"You tasked him with keeping an eye on Wysteria, but you need to bring him in." She slides the book back in its place and faces me. "Immediately."

"In?" I ask, playing dumb, though I know exactly what she means.

"If I'm to keep him from the death squad, he needs to become part of the Supernatural Task Force." She eyes me shrewdly. "He must be trained and tested. I want to make sure this boy you've chosen to become a vampire is worthy of us."

"He is," I say, feeling protective. "But, he's also in love with my sister. He's proven himself just by protecting her."

"That is true, and she does need him as her guardian, but I cannot let him run around as he is. Unsanctioned. I've already heard from the elven king that he wants the boy killed. There are other voices as well, and even though I am the queen of all supernaturals, it's my job to listen to the words of the leaders of all the realms."

She's right, but I don't like it. I've sworn to protect my sister, but every time I'm near her, my old ways come crawling back. Thoughts of power and all I could achieve with my sister's blood. I can't be as close to her as I want. I need Austin to do for me what I'm too weak to accomplish.

"When you see as I do that, he is one of the best, you'll know why I changed him. Plus, I'll train him to become part of the Supernatural Task Force upon Wysteria's graduation from college."

Snow shakes her head. "That is too long, Chris. You will bring him in as soon as you can. I will meet with him, and then determine what is to be done with him. If I deem him worthy, I will sanction him and bring him in as a secret member of the Task Force. You will train him, but it must be kept a secret, even from your sister. No one can know until his official inauguration. Is that an acceptable compromise?"

I'm confused. "Wouldn't it be better if those from the other realms know he's part of the Task Force?"

She shakes her head. "I do not trust some of the leaders, especially not the elven king. It will be enough for now that I've sanctioned him."

I nod. "Yes, your majesty. I will bring him to you right away."

Snow smiles. "Thank you, Christopher." She returns to her desk and sits, picking up her pen. "See you soon."

OceanofPDF.com

SOBER KISS

WYSTERIA

"So, Romney? How'd you guys meet?" I ask Sage, tucking my biology study guide back in my bag and climbing off my bed.

She doesn't answer right away. She's playing coy, flipping through a fashion magazine. She's lying on her bed, fully dressed, except for her shoes, and seems more relaxed than I've seen her ever.

I haven't told Sage about what happened in the piano room yesterday. The experience is too private, too fantastic, and I'm not quite ready to share. Austin and I practiced our duet, and he invited me over for dinner. That's all I said. She seems to think tonight is the night. I've told her more than once that isn't going to happen.

After removing my sweats, I pull on my slightly baggy jeans and a white shirt and braid my hair. Lip gloss on my lips. Ballet flats on my feet.

When she sees I'm dressing, she goes over to her jewelry box, then hands me her heart necklace, the one she let me wear the other night and the one that she put a tracking spell on. "Just in case."

"Thanks, Sage." I place it over my head, letting it fall and dangle against my shirt.

"No biggie." She plops back on her bed and returns to her magazine.

"Romney?" I remind her, rubbing on some deodorant.

"Uh." She peels back one of the pages and rubs it on her wrist. From past experience, I know she's trying a sample perfume, and I smell it in the air. It's nice.

"He's in my biology class," Sage finally says. "He's my lab partner. We talk. He seems to like that I'm kind of bonkers. And I like his pretty hair." Sage slams her magazine shut and faces me. "End of story."

"Did you get your first sober kiss?"

She smiles and is about to tell me, I'm sure of it, but there's a knock on the door.

I know it's Austin. Just the thought of him makes my heart pound in a beautiful melody as my veins sing in harmony. The butterflies in my belly are back and pirouetting eagerly.

Sage opens the door. "Hey."

"How's it going, Sage." He steps into the room.

I walk toward him like he's gravity, and I'm the moon. I can't resist his pull, and I don't want to. I move into his atmosphere and bask in his radiance. He smiles at me. And I'm whole.

When I'm close, he reaches out his hand, and I take it. My hand in his. Our hands together. It's right. I know it. My parents must somehow know it too. Austin is kind, generous, and giving.

"What are you making her for dinner?" Sage asks, her hands clasped behind her back.

He looks at her and then at me. "I was thinking about peanut butter and jelly?" He raises his eyebrows in question.

Sage bursts into laughter. "Sounds about right." Then her face turns serious. "As long as you don't eat her," she adds.

If she only knew, I think, but don't comment. Just smile and enjoy the easy tension between them.

"Actually, I've got Chicken Cordon Bleu in the oven, a green salad in the refrigerator, some French bread, and chocolate soufflé for dessert." Austin looks at me when he says the word dessert, and a lusty zing shoots along my lower belly.

"Who made it, your mommy?" Sage is teasing him, and under any other circumstance, it would be funny. But not with Austin.

I inhale. Glance at him carefully. His mother died when he was a baby. He doesn't remember her, and he's always been touchy about it. A few times, when I was over at Austin's house, his dad would fling around words about his mother, words like trash and junkie. I think his dad did it to make Austin angry. It worked.

Sage and her big freaking mouth!

I squeeze his hand. "Sounds fantastic," I say, moving closer.

Austin walks me to the door.

"You two have fun." Sage waves. She's none the wiser about the pain she's inflicted.

"See ya, Roomie," I say, but notice her wince as I close the door.

I know that even though we haven't talked about it, what Doug did to her, and then that she stabbed him with a stake before watching Austin kill him has her filled with anxiety. And I want to make her feel better, do something to ease her pain. But I'm not sure what that something is. At least there's a beginning happening between her and Romney. Hopefully, with Romney, she can have many good firsts. A relationship. Maybe even love - if Romney deserves it.

I glance at Austin as we ride down the elevator.

He's watching me. "She's sad, but she's going to be okay," he says.

"Thanks," I say, leaning against him.

"I love feeling your emotions. You're so open, so good. Are you sure you want to love a vampire like me?"

I kiss him gently on the mouth. Suckle his bottom lip. "You're the only guy I ever wanted to get involved with, Austin Morrison."

OceanofPDF.com

WHO CHANGED YOU

WYSTERIA

I HELP Austin clean up after dinner. “Even though you’re a vampire, you still haven’t lost your cooking skills,” I say, placing the remainder of the salad in the fridge. “Everything was delicious.”

“Thanks. I cooked for myself a long time. A guy can only eat so many bologna sandwiches before he has to take matters into his own hands.”

I force a laugh. We are suddenly moving toward territory I want to avoid. Talk about his home life, his dad. I know he can’t help what happened. I know it isn’t his fault, but I can’t talk about his dad like he’s some average guy. He isn’t.

Austin closes the fridge and grabs my hands. “What are you thinking about now?” He brushes some hair off my face, stroking my cheek with his thumbs.

“My mom used to cook strange meals.”

He smiles, a little sad. “Like what?”

I think a second. “Marinated meatballs in crisp taco shells was a weird one. Sushi with spaghetti, lima beans, and tofu.”

Austin’s face twists in disgust.

“You want me to go on?”

“Nah, I get it.” He gently pulls me into the living room. “Want to watch some TV?”

“Sure.” We sit on his couch.

He locates the TV remote and turns it on. Football highlights fill the screen. “Football?”

“If you want.” I sit back against the cushions.

He faces me, touches my lips with his forefinger. “What do you like to watch?"

I'm momentarily distracted by the way my body is suddenly humming at his nearness. He touches me, and I'm like a light, on and ready to shine. My eyes focus on his lips. I want to kiss him, touch him. So many ideas fill my head.

He taps my nose playfully. "Earth to Wysteria. Come in, Wysteria."

I blush. "Not much, really." I tuck my hands in my lap. "I prefer to read."

He scoots closer. "What do you read?"

His proximity is making me want to forget all about TV and reading. "The Great Gatsby. Anne of Green Gables. Lord of the Flies. The Count of Monte Cristo," I say, trying to keep my words easy.

Austin trails his finger across my eyebrows. Under my eyes. Along my nose. Across my lips. My jaw. "What about movies?"

"I can't remember the last movie I saw."

He straightens like I've smacked him. "That's really sad. There are some good ones."

My mind traveled back further, to when my parents were alive. When life was sweet. "My mom and I watched Pride and Prejudice together. She called it a mother-daughter date. We went to the movie and ate Junior Mints. After, we got burgers and fries and talked for hours."

That night is one of my favorite memories with my mother.

Austin cups my face in his hands. "Sounds like an amazing time," he says softly. "Want to watch one of my favorites?"

"Sure." I am determined to focus on the here and now.

He kneels in front of the cabinet under the TV and pulls open a drawer. There are dozens of movies standing at attention side by side. "The Matrix or Black Panther?" he asks, holding up the movie cases.

It is fun watching him. I push myself to the edge of the couch. "Either sounds good."

“If you want pure entertainment, there’s Underworld or - ” as he says the name of the movie, he flashes the case. “Star Trek is actually pretty good.”

I rest my elbows on my knees and my face in my hands, unable to help but smile. “Let’s watch Black Panther,” I say.

“You read my mind.” He grabs the movie and puts it in the DVD player. Then presses something, and the movie previews appear on the screen.

“You mind if I use your bathroom?”

“Go ahead. I even cleaned it because I knew you were coming.” He walks over and flicks on the light.

I can’t help but notice the closed doors to the left of the bathroom, and I wonder what’s behind them. Austin follows my eyes, and I know he knows what I’m thinking.

“You want to see the rest of my apartment?” He moves to the door on the left and opens it. There is a small, brown upright piano on the far wall, a window directly across from the entrance, and a closet to the left. Sheet music, music stands, and boxes of old music books are scattered all over the floor. “Piano room,” he says, nonchalant.

“I love it,” I say, and mean it. “You’re so lucky. I miss having a piano so close by. You can roll out of bed and practice, play until your heart is content.”

He chuckles. “Yeah, I guess that’s pretty cool.” Then he closes the door and moves on to the door at the end of the small hall and opens it. I don’t know what I was expecting, but it’s just a standard room.

“Spare bedroom,” he says.

I peer in, looking around more closely than I need to. I don’t know why.

Austin’s features are furrowed. “What were you expecting? A vampire lair? A casket?” He nudges into my shoulder. “Not all of us are like Doug,” he adds softly.

“Oh, I know. I guess I was just expecting something that proves you’re a womanizing vampire?”

He crosses his arms. “Look, regarding those rumors, I know what people say about me. And to some degree, I guess I deserve it. I’ve dated. A lot, especially before I became a vampire. But I treat every woman with respect. I’ve never hurt anyone. At least not on purpose.” His face is soft, his eyes sincere.

“I believe you. I’m sorry, Austin.” I hug him tightly. The things people say about him, what Sage told me about him, they are rumors. Nothing more. College kids making stuff up. I know the real Austin. He’s shown me over and over again the last several weeks what kind of man he is.

He hugs me back. Tilts my head so I can see his face. Kisses me. His lips are gentle, filled with care.

“Mmm, you are a great kisser,” I whisper against his lips.

He smirks, his lips still on mine. “And you’re such an authority.”

“Hey, I have good taste.” My fingers have found their way under his t-shirt, stroking the tight skin over his ripped abs. My pinky fingers keep brushing against the band of his jeans. Goosebumps constrict his skin, and he breathes out slowly. “You smell good, too,” I say.

“Man smell or vampire smell?” he asks and shrugs.

“I don’t know, but I love it.” I stand on my tiptoes and kiss his chin, knowing full well I probably smell like garlic. I had more than one piece of garlic bread.

Austin smiles and kisses the top of my head. “Should we watch our movie?”

“Course. Except - ” I pause and look up at him. I want so much more. A movie doesn’t sound like the best usage of our time.

“What?” His eyes become hooded. He’s read my emotions and knows what I really want.

“Do you have any Junior Mints?” I ask, trying to throw him off.

Besides, they really are my favorite candy.

“If you’re sure that’s what you want.” He winks. Walks into the kitchen and opens a cupboard. I follow and see there is a box of the candy resting in plain view. He eyes me. “Do I have Junior Mints?” He shakes his head and snorts.

“Impressive.” The vampire has skills.

We return to the couch, and he puts an arm around my shoulders. I rest my head against his, comfortable. We fit. The movie is in full swing, and half of the Junior Mints are gone, but I’m not really focused on the film. I can’t stop thinking about Austin. I still don’t know much about what his life was like while I was gone.

He laughs suddenly, and I jump, surprised by the noise and his movement.

“Did I scare you?” he asks.

I nod sheepishly, sitting up. “Sorry, I was just thinking. Distracted.”

“Want to tell me about it?” He pauses the movie, his lips twitching slightly.

“How did you become a vampire? Why? Who changed you?” I ask the questions in quick succession.

He pulls back, turning so he’s facing me fully. “These questions are what’s on your mind?” He isn’t prepared. I can tell by his reaction.

“Yeah.” I pop a candy in my mouth, enjoying the soft mint and chocolate flavor.

“I thought the anxiety I felt from you had to do with the movie.” He turns, lifting a knee onto the couch between us.

“Nope. My mind has been on you. Will you tell me?” I rest my head against the back of the couch. “Or is it too personal?”

“I mean, I’ve never told anyone about what happened.” He looks slightly nervous and glances at something beyond me, out the window.

“If you’d rather not, I totally understand,” I say, even though I’m desperate to hear what happened.

“It was a little over a year ago. During the summer, I work on a ranch. On the day I nearly died, I was helping a cow get unstuck from a barbed-wire fence. I was so focused on her that I didn’t hear the bull until it was too late.” He lifts his shirt and points to the spot between his ribs. “It got me with one of its horns right here.”

I touch the place, feeling his warm skin, thankful beyond words that’s he’s alive. That he was saved, whether it was approved or not. “And then a vampire found you?”

“Yeah.” He nods. “It was Christopher who found me,” he says.

“What?” I’m shocked even though I shouldn’t be. My brother seemed to make his way to Gothel Springs often, even when I wasn’t around.

“He knew you and I were friends. I was about dead. There was no time to follow the law and get the proper paperwork in order, so he did it. Bit me. Then took me somewhere.” Austin lowers his voice. “He never told me where I was, but I think it was Sharra. He had a little house there and took care of me until I was fully healed. Then showed me what to do. Trained me on how to be a decent and upstanding vampire. When he felt I was ready, he brought me home. I was gone for three weeks and had to lie to my uncle and cousin about my whereabouts.” He runs a hand over his face, putting his shirt down.

“I’m so glad Christopher saved you. If you weren’t alive when I came back, I - ” Just thinking about him not being here makes me want to cry. “I owe my brother big time.”

“Yeah, that’s how I feel too,” Austin says, in more ways than one. He doesn’t elaborate.

I about to ask him to elaborate, but there’s a noise outside the front door.

We both freeze.

Austin stands, putting a finger to his lips. He goes over to the window beside the door and peers out. “No one is there.” He opens the door.

There’s a small box on the ground.

“What is it?” I ask, jumping up but feeling apprehensive.

Austin holds me at arm’s length. “It has your name on it.” He looks out into the opaque night, tilting his head as though he’s listening for whoever left the package. Then he cautiously picks up the box.

“Why would they leave something for me here.” Nervous jitters and not the good kind filter along my spine.

“I don’t know.” He puts an ear to it. Smells it and shakes it. Something smacks around against the sides. “I can’t tell what’s in there,” he says, a question on his face.

“Should I open it?” I reach out to take it from him.

“Sure, just be careful.”

As he watches, I rip off the tape and pull back the lid.

“What is it?” he asks, leaning over so he can see, but I turn away.

It’s difficult to register what I’m looking at and why. I blink several times until I realize tears are streaming down my cheeks. “I - it’s - ”

“Wysteria?” He comes around and takes the little box, looking inside. “Who would do this?”

There’s a worry in his voice, but I can’t respond. I can’t do anything but stare. All of the happiness of a moment ago smashes to pieces, and I sink to the floor.

Austin is there, kneeling beside me. The deep timbre of his voice cuts through, but I can’t understand what he’s saying. Finally, he lifts me into his arms and carries me into the spare bedroom. Lays me down and sits beside me, one of his hands stroking my hair. It feels nice, but I’m struggling to breathe.

Inside the box was a photo of my mom and dad lying on the floor in their own blood. Austin’s dad must’ve taken the picture after he killed them, but why? My mind is back at that moment when I discovered my dead parents' bodies. I wonder how I ever thought I could get over such a gruesome scene. The smell of death, the sound of silence, except for my screams. And then I run away from them. Leave the house to escape what I've seen. As I'm running, someone steps out in front of me. He's tall, feels like a giant. He holds me with one hand while a bag is thrown over my head. Then there's pressure. I think someone performs a spell, and it's like I'm underwater. Drowning.

When I wake, I'm in Redyrin's realm, and all recollections of my life before are washed away.

That's why seeing the photo distresses me so profoundly. I'm still mourning the loss of my family, and someone knows that.

"Redyrin did this," I say, knowing it's true. "She came through before the realm was sealed off. She's here, and she wants me back."

"I think you're right," Austin says. "But I'll be damned if I let her have you." He kisses my forehead. "We'll figure out how to stop her together."

OceanofPDF.com

OceanofPDF.com

EVAN'S COLOGNE

AUSTIN

FOR THE DEAD, the hard part is over. Not so for the living. The difficulty is only just beginning. To rise each day with a gnawing ache while knowing it's important to mourn and try to move on.

The photo of Wysteria's mom and dad lying in their blood sickens me. I can't imagine how finding them like that must've been for her. My dad's death was harsh, and I could barely stand him.

When Wysteria falls into a fitful sleep, I call Christopher and tell him what's going on. He's relieved to know I'm with his sister and that she's okay. I can hear it in his voice, but there's more.

"I'm coming to town. Snow White wants to meet." Christopher's words are clipped, unemotional.

"It's about Doug," I say, knowing the time has come to pay for my sins.

He sighs. "That and you're unsanctioned. It needs to be addressed. We'll discuss it when I get there. I don't want to say more over the phone."

"When will I see you?" Before he answers, someone is at my door, unlocking it. I immediately smell Evan's cologne and the stench of his cigarettes. "I have to go." I hang up and wait for my cousin to enter.

"Austin. Bro. You decent?" Evan is focused on his phone.

I crack my knuckles and take a deep breath, blowing it out loudly as an answer.

Surprised, Evan looks up, only mild guilt on his face. "Hey," he says, eyeing me sharply.

"How did you get in? The door was locked," I say, crossing my arms.

He holds up a key. “Dude, I made myself a spare.” Evan gives me a once over. “Nice outfit. Bet Pudgy Wu— uh, Wysteria loves it.” He laughs, obnoxious, heading over to the kitchen, opens the fridge, removes a beer, and cracks it open. “I know she’s here.” He glances toward the closed door of the spare bedroom. “If you’re done with her, I’m going to take a turn.” His gaze turns down the hall toward my bedroom. “Which room is she in? You promised the last time she was over that I could have some fun with her.”

My mind buzzes with a seething anger as I put myself between my cousin and Wysteria. “What? Are you spying on me now?” I ask, ready to fight if he doesn’t give me an answer I like.

“Dude, chill. I was home when you brought her over. The walls aren’t that thick.” He tries to push past me, but I block him, holding his arm so he can’t move.

“Get out. Wys is sleeping,” I hiss through clenched teeth.

“Not for long,” he says, shoving past me, tucking his phone in his pocket.

I grab him by the arm, using more strength than I should. But what the hell, my vampirism is going to be out soon anyway. “I said no, Evan.”

He looks down at my hand, then up at me. His eyes are hard. “What do you care? She isn’t good enough for you, and you know it. You have royal elven blood. She’s nothing but a stupid commoner. Why are you protecting her? Let’s have some fun—”

“Evan, I swear to all the Gods, if you finish that sentence, I’ll make you wish you hadn’t.” Our little chat the other night meant nothing to him.

Evan snorts. Shoves me. “You saying you’d choose her over me? Over family?” His features contort like he can’t believe it, and he’s pissed.

But I’m beyond caring what he thinks. “That’s exactly what I’m saying. Yes.” I nod once. At the same time, I drag him toward the door. As I go, I notice the box with the photo in it on the floor. “Did you do this?” Evan can be cruel. I pick up the box, which is still holding the picture, and shove it in his face.

“Wow, that’s sad.” He shakes his head in mock sympathy. He doesn’t look sad at all.

“Tell me the truth!”

“No, man.” Evan chuckles. “But maybe I should have. When her parents were alive, they drove a wedge between my dad and yours. She’s doing the same to you and me.” He shakes his head, disgusted. “I don’t get you. You know your ancestry. Yet you fawn over Wysteria like she’s the queen, and you’re nothing but the court jester.” He pulls from my grasp, and I let him.

“I don’t care about that,” I say, snapping my teeth together. Then I think of something. “The bigger question is, why do you care? Our fathers were banished. Our mothers are human. No one in the elven realm knows we exist.”

Evan’s eyes narrow craftily. “Maybe things have changed. Maybe the king actually does know about us.” He removes the photo from the box before flinging the cardboard onto the couch. “Think about that as you’re screwing the little nobody piece of ass.” He shoves the picture into my chest. Walks to the door. “Don’t make me regret my friendship, or there will be consequences.” He yanks on the knob, flinging the door open, then slams it shut once he’s outside my apartment.

I heave a sigh of relief after locking the door. Evan’s words echo in my mind. He threatened me, but he’s done that so many times before I’ve lost count. It might be time to add a deadbolt.

Picking up the picture, I scrutinize it, searching for what, I don’t know. I do notice my dad’s favorite baseball hat is on the floor beside Wysteria’s dad. At least I think it’s his. He went over to Wysteria’s house a lot. My dad and Wysteria's parents were friends. It seems odd the hat is on the floor, leaning on its side, so it’s easy to read the writing: Gothel Police Department. Not only am I a vampire, but I possess a little of the elves' eternal sight. And I know Wysteria is telling the truth about my father. He really did murder them. But why?

I flip over the photo. There are words written on the back. Three handwritten words, to be exact. In all caps, someone wrote: YOU'RE NEXT WYSTERIA.

Devastated, I sit on the couch, trying to figure out what to do next —no point involving the police. Without a doubt, this isn't a human matter, but a supernatural one. The Supernatural Task Force should be involved. I lean back and suck in a deep breath. It hasn't been that long since Wys came back into my life, but I know without a doubt that I'll choose Wysteria over my family every time.

OceanofPDF.com

WE'RE RELATED

WYSTERIA

WHEN I OPEN MY EYES, there's light shining through the blinds. "Austin?" I call out. My throat is raw, and my eyes burn, probably from crying. I'm not surprised by my reaction. Even though I see their dead bodies in my mind almost daily, last night, it was like I was eleven again, and I just found them dead. An ache fills my heart. Followed by hope. Abernathy awakened the power within me to summon the dead. So, while they no longer exist in this realm, they are still out there. All isn't lost, I think, working to convince myself that talking to ghosts is the same as having my parents alive and around. It doesn't work.

I throw off the blanket and stand. I'm still in Austin's spare bedroom, fully dressed, except for my shoes. Austin must've removed them for me, and I'm grateful. Without a doubt, I love him. If he'll have me, I want to be with him forever. It doesn't matter whether I'm meant to be the queen of the elven realm or something else. Austin is a part of me, and I can feel our lives are infinitely intertwined.

As I slide on my shoes, I take a deep breath. "Leva," I call out, even though she isn't here. She's not even in this realm but has returned to Sharra. If only there were a way I could call her and tell her how I feel. I think about Snow White. We're related. At least, according to Abernathy. My brother knows her. Maybe I could ask him. I grab my phone off the bedside table and think about calling him. Before I do, I notice several texts.

Sage texted me twice. Staying the night with Romney. Don't worry. And, Are you and Austin still together? Still the big V? Let me know you're all right.

"That girl has a one-track mind." I shake my head and move on.

There's also a text from Austin. Had an emergency. See you later. Lock the door when you leave. We need to talk!

My pulse quickens. What's the emergency? Does he know who delivered that picture and why? What does he want to talk about? I hope he's safe. I quickly text Sage. I'm okay. I debate whether to comment on my virgin status but decide I might as well, or she'll keep asking. Yep, still the big V. I don't go into details.

The clock on the wall says it's eight fifty-five. My English class starts in five minutes. I'm not going to make it. And since I have Austin's place to myself for the next hour at least, I decide to take a look around, a.k.a. snoop a little and see what the man I love keeps around his place.

After freshening up in the bathroom, I make myself toast and wander as I eat. On the desk in his room is a computer. The screensaver is an image of scrolling musical notes—a piano rendition of Titanium. I can hear the melody in my head as it crosses the screen. His window has blue curtains. They're open, and I peer outside. In the distance is Gothel University. What few trees there are have lost all of their leaves. The grass is yellow, and the wind is blowing. A giant tumbleweed bounces across the park near the complex and gets stuck on the slide.

My stomach grumbles, and I head toward the kitchen, still hungry. Open the fridge. There are strawberries in a blue ceramic bowl. Next to it is a smaller bowl of what looks like chocolate sauce. Underneath is the chocolate soufflé.

Guilt blooms in my chest. We didn't get to eat dessert.

"You're such an idiot." I grab a strawberry and pop it in my mouth. It is delicious. I get a bottle of water and open it. Chug half of it down. I wonder how Austin can afford a three-bedroom apartment on his own?

The bedroom which holds his upright piano is closed, but I can't resist going in. I want to play, lose myself in the music for a little while. The room smells like old paper and Austin. A heady combination. I sit at the bench and run through a few exercises. Limbering up my fingers. While playing, I allow my mind to wander.

I think about Sage. Abernathy and all he told me, including conversing with the dead. As I play, I close my eyes and imagine my mom and dad. The smell of them, the way my mom would smile, and my dad would wink. I think about our training sessions and all they taught me about supernaturals and how to fight. Our family dinners and movie nights. I think about their love for each other and me. Something inside me springs to life with each memory, connects with my indigo magic, and the two churns together.

There's a sudden, quick breeze, and I open my eyes. Someone is in here. I can feel their presence. Slowly, I turn around and suck in a breath. The ghosts of my mom and dad stand near the doorway.

"It worked." I'm in a bit of shock.

The two of them hold hands. They are smiling and seem content. Happy even.

"Wysteria," my mom says as they both come forward.

My heart is racing, and my hands are sweaty. "Hi," I say, not quite ready to believe I see them.

"We've missed you," Dad says, reaching out like he wants to hug me, but his hand goes right through me. A look of dismay presses down his features. "I know I'm dead, but I should still be able to hug my sweet Freckles." It was his nickname for me back when I was six or seven.

"It's okay, Dad." My voice quivers in conjunction with my body.

Mom claps her hands together. "It's been too long."

It hits me then that this is real. They aren't hallucinations or a figment of my imagination, but they can talk to me just as I can to them. "I'm sorry," I say. It's the first thing that comes to mind.

"Nonsense," Dad says.

“What for?” Mom asks.

“If I hadn’t snuck out. If I’d been there that night, then maybe you wouldn’t be dead.” My bottom lip trembles as I speak. My guilt bubbles over.

“That isn’t true. If you’d have been there, you might be dead too.” Mom wipes tears from her eyes.

Did they know I was taken to another realm? “I’m in love,” I blurt and then cover my mouth with both hands. I hadn’t meant to tell them that. There are other, more pertinent topics to discuss.

“How wonderful,” Mom says, her face softening into a lovely smile.

“Who is this person?” Dad asks, crossing his arms.

“Austin Morrison. Do you remember him?” I try to keep it light even though my feelings for him are anything but.

“The neighbor boy. You always did have a thing for him.” Mom reaches out like she wants to touch me but pulls back at the last second.

“It went away when I was in the other realm, but as soon as I returned and saw him again, the feelings came back too.” I sit back on the piano bench.

Dad snaps his fingers, and two chairs appear out of nowhere. My parents sit.

“What’s going on with him?” he asks, and it feels like an interrogation.

“So, then you haven’t seen what’s been happening since…” I can’t finish the sentence.

Mom looks sad. “No. The After Life is like another realm. We try to make the most of it, but we only hear little things here and there when someone new enters.” She looks at my Dad, and he squeezes her hand. “We think about you every day, though.”

I blink back tears, working to stay strong. “I think about you too.”

I don't add that it's usually of them dead or the guilt I feel over not being there when they died.

"Tell us about Austin," Mom says.

I'm grateful for the distraction. "He's grown so much. He's a vampire now, but a good—"

"He's a vampire," my Dad interrupts.

"Yes." I glance down at my hands. "It isn't his fault. He nearly died, and Christopher, my brother, changed him."

Mom inhales at the name. "You've met my Chris? How is that possible? I thought he was dead. He went out to get groceries and never came back." She covers her mouth with both hands as she cries.

Dad rubs her back. "It's okay."

"He became a vampire," I say simply.

"How?" Mom sits on the edge of her chair, seemingly desperate for news on her first child. "I wasn't a good mother to him," she says, shaking her head.

I don't know the whole story, but I tell them what I do know. That he helped save the world. I leave out the part where he also tried to destroy it. He's changed too.

"Vampires!" Dad says the word like it's venomous.

"I know, Dad. And some are as you and mom taught me. But Christopher and Austin aren't. Especially Austin. He's wonderful, in fact. When I was rescued from Redyrin and the other realm where I was held prisoner, he found me and got me help. And he's been around ever since." I pause and think about all Austin's done for me. "I wouldn't be alive if it wasn't for him." An image of Doug fills my mind, and I shudder.

"I don't trust them," Dad says. Mom puts a hand on his arm, and he leans back in his chair. "But, I'm glad he's helped you so much and that you've found love."

"Thanks, Dad."

“You were in another realm?” That fact seems to hit my mom suddenly.

I tell them how I was taken soon after discovering their bodies and kept a prisoner there for seven years. Then I tell them about Leva and all she did to get me out of there and return me to the human realm.

“My goodness,” Mom says. “I’m so sorry we weren’t there to help you.”

“It’s okay.” I smile. “I’m glad you’re here now.”

“Me too, but how is it possible?” Dad asks.

My heart sinks a little. I’d hoped they could give me that answer. “I’m the fountain of youth,” I say.

They look at each other and nod.

“We know,” Dad says.

“But how do you tell a child such things?” Mom asks though it’s obvious she doesn’t want an answer.

“There’s more,” I say.

“Go on,” Mom encourages.

“When I spoke with the dragon, Abernathy, he said our blood comes from elven and unicorn royalty?” I ask it like a question because even though I am able to summon them, I’m still having a hard time believing it.

Mom and Dad are unconvinced. This is news to them. I can see it on their faces. So, I go on. “Dad, your ancestors are descendants of Devoran, the original elven king, which means we’re also related to Snow White.” I cross one leg over the other and rest my upper body on my knee. For some reason, I want to get small. Probably because it feels so weird to be telling them something they didn’t know already.

Dad speaks first. “I mean, I guess it’s possible. I never knew my parents, and your mother’s never shared anything that had to do with family history.”

“Dad’s right.” She shakes her head in astonishment. “But, you spoke with Abernathy?"

"Yes," I say, sitting up. "He unlocked the power within me to summon you."

"I mean, if the dragon says it's true, it must be." There's a wonder in her voice. "But I'm having a hard time believing it," Mom adds.

"Not only that, but Abernathy said the elf on the throne took it by deceit and that his family doesn't belong there and never did." Now that I'm sharing, I can't seem to stop. It feels good to be talking to them.

"Well, I'll be damned," Dad says, slapping his ghostly knee.

"What?" I ask, thinking that's a weird response.

"Austin's father and uncle are the elven king's banished brothers. Austin's dad told us one night after a few too many the truth about why he was in the human realm." He laughs. "Turns out the murdering bastard is no more royal than a gnat."

"Wait a second. Austin's dad and uncle?" My pulse picks up speed again. Does Austin know?

"Just wait until he hears about this," Mom says.

"Austin's dad is dead. Isn't he in the After Life with you?" I'm unsure how that all works.

"He's dead?" My mom plays nervously with her hair. "We didn't know."

"Why do you think Austin's dad killed you?" I hope the answers will help me figure out what to do next.

"We have our theories," Mom utters.

"Yes, we believe it had to do with you and that you're the fountain of youth." Dad glances at my Mom. "But if what you've told us is true, then there could be more than one reason. It may also be because he knew of our ancestry and wanted us out of the way."

My heart beats so loudly it beats in my ears. A panic attack is coming on, and I force myself to breathe in and out. I can't lose it in front of my parents. I stand and turn away, focusing on the landscape beyond the window. Another tumbleweed is bouncing along the ground like a rubber ball. It's then I hear the wind whistling through the panes. I hadn't noticed before. "His uncle doesn't seem like a nice man," I finally admit.

"No, he isn't. He never was. You need to be prepared for him to try coming after you again," Dad declares.

"It wasn't him that took me the first time. It was Redyrin. Her desires for me were selfish. She used me to keep her looking young." I face them again, my hands at my sides.

"Perhaps there was more to it than that. What is the name of the realm?" Mom stands and comes closer. So close that if she weren't a ghost, I would be able to feel the warmth of her skin and smell the mellow hints of her perfume. She gives me a sad smile.

"I don't know the name. She never told me." I don't add that I think she's here in the human realm. No need to worry them.

Dad looks behind him as though he can see something I can't. "We have to go, but summon us again soon." He stands behind my mom, resting his hands on her shoulders. "I love you, Wysteria."

"Yes," Mom says, reaching out and trying to take my hand. I do the same, but it's useless. "I love you so much."

I don't want them to go, but I guess I didn't expect them to be able to stay with me like this forever. Even as I think such things, they begin to fade. "I love you too," I say, and they're gone.

In their absence, the throbbing in my chest intensifies, and the tears pressing against my eyes suddenly fall. I turn in a circle, looking for a tissue box. I open the closet, even though there's no reason a tissue would be inside. It's stuffed to overflowing with odd things, but no tissues. Still, the sheer magnitude of stuff distracts me from my sadness.

There are crates of old books and yellowing sheet music. Worn clothes and more. One is piled to the top with sealed envelopes.

That's different. I lift the crate out of the closet and pick up one of the letters. When I see who they're addressed to, my breath hitches in my throat.

It has my name on it without an address. I pull out a few from a stack of dozens. They are all from Austin and addressed to me.

While I was gone, he wrote letters to me. An eager excitement rocks my body to its core. I have to know what they say.

I pick up the crate, thinking I'll carry it and all of the letters back to my dorm. But what if Austin sees me? The container is too conspicuous. I search frantically for a bag, something. Anything. I run into the kitchen and throw open cupboards. I spot bowls, plates, cups, wine glasses. Cereal, boxes of macaroni and cheese. Bread, peanut butter, and jelly. But no bags. Finally, I spot a wadded-up grocery sack on the floor near the trash can.

"Yes!" I cheer.

I shove all the letters inside, grab my phone, and head for the door. I don't have a ride, but it's okay. I can walk.

After locking the apartment door like Austin asked, I realize too late just how cold it is, and I don't have a jacket. The wind whips around my hair, biting against my skin. Small flecks of snow swirl around like a frozen tornado.

At that moment, I consider what I've done. When Austin returns home, he'll discover the empty crate I hastily stuffed back in the closet. What will he think of me for stealing his stuff?

"I'm an idiot," I say, slamming my head against his door, but it's too late. Part of me is glad because I want to read what he wrote.

OceanofPDF.com

PAIR OF SCISSORS

WYSTERIA

WHEN I GET inside the room, I pause, still debating what to do. Should I read the letters now? "Yes." I plop onto my bed and dump them all out. Then organize them into neat little rows. It's then I notice Austin wrote the date on the envelope flap, and I rearrange them according to date. My hands tremble as I touch them. If I open these, there will be no going back. Austin will know I've read them, even if I were to somehow sneak them back into his apartment. But if I come clean now, maybe he'd give them to me. Let me read them anyway. I should've asked him instead of stealing them. I feel terrible invading his privacy like this and stealing from him.

I'm a rotten, no-good thief.

I'm about to pack them all up when I notice one with a single heart drawn in black pen on the front.

A heart.

My heart speeds up and beats against my chest. I have to read it.

Just this one. Then I'll take them back. I cut off one of the short sides of the envelope with a pair of scissors, blow inside, and carefully slide the three-ring binder paper out. I unfold it and read:

Dear Wysteria,

I turned fourteen today. Didn't do much. Hung out with Evan. We saw a movie. Ate. Listened to music.

I kept thinking about you. I never stop.

When we went to the movies, I ordered Junior Mints because those are your favorite. When we ate lunch, I ordered a cheeseburger instead of a chicken sandwich because I know that's what you would've ordered. Evan asked what my problem was, but I ignored him.

You were everywhere today. I could swear I saw you six different times. Your long hair tucked behind your ears. But then the girl would turn around, and it wasn't you.

I kept looking. I'll keep looking. I won't ever stop.

I wish it were you instead of Evan I hung with today. We probably would've done the same thing, but it would've been a lot more fun because it would've been with you.

Remember the cake you made for my eleventh birthday? It was chocolate with chocolate icing. You put sprinkles on it and eleven candles. At the time, I acted kind of embarrassed, like I didn't like it. But I want you to know it meant a lot to me. It still does. Every birthday since, I've thought about your cake. Your kindness. The way your eyes light up when you're excited about something. You. I'm always thinking about you.

Since you've been gone, it's a struggle to get out of bed, do what I have to, because you aren't here. My life was so much better when you were in it.

This may sound weird, but I think I love you. And not like best friend love. Even though I feel that way about you too, but my heart hasn't been the same since you left.

I miss you.

Wherever you are, I hope you're okay.

Austin

I read it once. Then again. And a third time. Studying each word. Each sentence. He thought he loved me at fourteen. I press the paper to my nose and inhale. It may be my imagination, but I swear I can smell his cologne on the paper.

I refold the letter, tuck it back into the envelope, and then set it on top of the pile for that year. I stare at the letters. All of them are written by the man I love. I can't give them back. Not yet. I have to read each and every letter. Each and every word, sentence, and paragraph.

I pick up the one with the most recent date stamped on it. Cut the edge open like I did the first one and pull out the paper. It's dated a year ago. Before I read, I smell the paper. It smells like Austin.

Dear Wysteria,

This will be my final letter. Something's happened. I'm a vampire now. In order to live, I have to drink blood. At first, the prospect was daunting. Then disgusting. Now, though, it isn't bad. I have no choice, and so I make the most of it. The vampire who turned me has been a big help, teaching me how to adapt to my new life. Others aren't so lucky. I see on the news how the Supernatural Task Force hunts down and destroys entire vampire nests. Each time I thankful, Christopher taught me how to drink without killing and tempering my vampire needs. Still, there's a chance the Supernatural Task Force will destroy me anyway. He turned me without getting it sanctioned. Whenever there's a knock at my door, I wonder if this time, they've come for me.

Whatever happens to me, I hope you're safe and happy and that you're studying to become a doctor, like you always wanted to be.

Wysteria. Where are you?

Sometimes I find myself thinking about what you must look like. How tall you are. Whether your hair is still long and if you're eyes are still so expressive.

I'm sure you're beautiful. You always were.

Please know I never stopped thinking about you. I never stopped caring. And I hope with all of my heart that you are living life to its fullest. That you are happy. That's all I want for you.

Always,

Austin

Tears drip onto the page. My heart is soaked with sadness for many reasons because life isn't fair sometimes. I wipe my eyes and steel myself. We each went through hard things, but we made it back to each other. I should be happy, ecstatic. All I feel is guilt. As I ponder my predicament, the door opens, and Sage stumbles in. Her eyes are glazed.

A strange smile coats her lips. “Hey, Wys. Wysteria. Wys. Bud. How are you?” She falls onto her bed and stares at the ceiling.

I do my best to hide the letters, but there’s a lot. When they are tucked under my covers, I walk over. “Hey, Sage. How was your night with Romney?”

She rolls onto her side. “So good. So, so good. He’s a rock star in bed. Sweet. Kind. Plus, he took me to dinner. We partied, just the two of us.” Her smile gets bigger.

She’s higher than a kite. On what, I don’t know. “What did you take?” I ask, sitting next to her, taking her hand.

Sage looks at me. “Aww, Wysteria. Don’t look so worried. Drugs are recreational. They’re fun.” She closes her eyes, inhales slowly. “I mean, look at me. Do I look like I’m having a bad time?”

Before I can say anything, she answers herself, “No. I feel great.” She lifts her hand and waves it slowly, mesmerized by the movement.

I try to calm down. Take deep breaths. She’s right. She doesn’t seem sad or in pain. “I thought Romney liked to party sober?” I know it’s her business, and I’m trying to be supportive, but all I feel is angry.

“He does.” She leans on one arm. Looks at me and blinks. “He was. I mean, he has his one year chip, but I blew it.” Tears fill her eyes. “He fell back into old habits because of me.” She smacks her forehead several times until I grab her arm. “I’m a bad person. A failure,” she says mournfully.

“No, Sage. You’re just hurting. Maybe you should talk to someone.” I want to suggest her mom or her dad, but I know that will be a bad idea.

“I’m talking to you.” She sits up and hugs me.

I hug her back, wishing I could say or do something to make her stop. “Yes, and I’m always here for you, but I don’t know if I’m enough. What about your therapist?”

She falls back onto the bed. “I will,” she says and rolls onto her side. “But first, I’m going to get some rest.”

I remove her shoes. Then cover her with a blanket. “Will you be okay?”

“Yes, Wys. I just need to sleep.” She snuggles with the blanket.

I shove the letters into my backpack and head for the door. It squeaks slightly.

“Wysteria?”

I turn back, looking at her, worried. “Yes?”

“You’re a really good friend.” She smiles. Her eyes are still closed.

“Thanks, Sage. So are you.”

OceanofPDF.com

GOLDEN LETTERS

AUSTIN

CHRISTOPHER LEADS me through the grand castle that Snow White calls home when she isn't working in the human realm. With my vampire hearing, I listen to students taking classes on the lower floors. This place was once nothing more than a vampire residence. Now, it's so much more. Host to nearly one hundred supernatural students and teachers, the castle is also the Seven Magics Academy. When I was young, around twelve, I heard about the place. Since I have elven blood in my veins, I hoped to go. My dad wouldn't allow it. It was the same with Wysteria's parents. They were probably worried about what someone would do with the fountain of youth. For me, it was because my dad was too arrogant. He thought we should be treated like royalty instead of banished and treated as nothing more than human.

I pass an office with the door closed. There's an inky black sign with the words Headmistress carved out in golden letters.

We don't stop there but continue until we reach another closed door. This time it merely says, Snow White. I'm surprised. Since she's the queen of the vampires and ruler over all supernaturals, I expected more grandeur.

Christopher glances at me. His eyes say something I don't understand. Then he knocks.

"Enter," a strong female voice responds.

Christopher blows out a breath as he holds open the door for me.

I enter nervously. My legs are shaky. I've seen the vampire queen on several occasions on TV, but this is the first time in real life. They say never meet your heroes. Snow's always been one of mine. But what if she hates me? What if she decides I should no longer be alive?

All sorts of reservations cross my mind. As soon as Snow smiles, they are all dashed to pieces.

“Hello.” Snow moves around the desk, her full-length dress swishing gently with every step. “You must be Austin.” She holds out her hand.

I take it, shaking softly, not wanting her to feel I’m threatening.

She looks at our hands together and squeezes lightly. I respond in kind. “Better,” she says, releasing me. “Now, why don’t you have a seat and tell me about yourself.” She indicates a chair before moving back around to her side of the enormous desk.

“Uh,” I say, glancing sideways at Christopher. She hasn’t acknowledged him, and I’m curious about why.

She speaks before I can say anything. “Christopher, thank you for bringing Austin. Have a seat.” She smiles at him and then me.

A zing of love shoots through my body. I wonder if that’s how everyone feels around her. It isn’t that I’m in love with her, but I do feel love, and like I would do anything she asks of me. Perhaps that’s her compulsion? I study her.

“Of course,” he says, sliding into the chair beside me. “Austin is one of the best. I think as soon as you hear from him yourself, you’ll agree.”

“Great.” She rests her hands on the table, clasping them together. “You are of elvish descent as well as human. I can smell that, though your vampire scent is the strongest.”

I nod. “Yes. My father was an elf, and mom was human. Both are dead. And I guess I should be as well.” I glance at Christopher. “I’m grateful he was around and changed me.”

“Yes, it was convenient that he was there when you needed him most.” The way she says it, I get the feeling she believes there might be more to the story.

“Even after Wysteria went missing, I made it a point to return to Gothel Springs regularly. I knew about Austin, of course, since Wys spent a lot of time with him. When I smelled his blood on the breeze, I didn't hesitate. He was nearly dead when I found him. But before that moment, I had no intention of changing him. Of that, you can be sure." Christopher sounds sincere. I believe him, but it's essential the queen does. Because she has experience with Christopher, and he betrayed her. Despite what Christopher says, Snow holds my fate in her hands.

She doesn't respond right away as though she's rolling around what he said on her tongue—tasting it for truth. Finally, she nods. "I believe you, Christopher. Thank you for setting my mind at ease. Now, you are excused." Her words are soft but filled with resolve. There is no room for discussion.

"If that is your wish." Christopher clamps his teeth together. I hear them. Then he walks out.

When it's just her and I, she comes around to my side of the table and sits. "Now, tell me about yourself."

At her nearness, my veins seem to quake. She is a vampire and a queen. It's like my very essence knows she is my ruler. "What do you want to know?"

"Since you've asked, let's start at the end. What have you done with your vampire abilities to make the human realm a better place?"

Wow, that's a tough question, but I think I know what she wants to hear. "I recently killed someone who was about to hurt my friend. If I hadn't stopped him, he would've kept trying too." I swallow, knowing if she wanted to, she could tear my head off.

"Your friend is Wysteria?" She tilts her head to the side.

"That's right. From a young age, I knew she was different. But it wasn't until Christopher told me that I found out she's the fountain of youth." I shake my head. "I don't care about that," I say. But a memory of her blood in my mouth and the way it makes me feel comes to the surface. My fangs press against my mouth. "Her blood," I begin and clear my throat. "It's amazing."

“You drank from her?” She seems surprised and eyes me sharply. “I believed she was unable to receive any sort of injury.”

“Me too. I mean, she never got hurt as a kid, but then no one ever tried to bite her before me.” I’m embarrassed and can’t help the physical reaction I have. I also sense that Snow isn’t angry. Nor does her emotions say she wants to kill me, and I’m relieved. “Wysteria, let me drink from her,” I add, just in case she isn’t sure. “I’m not the kind of a person to force myself on others, despite how I was raised.” I clear my throat and work to push the thoughts of my dad from my head. “I’m not that kind of vampire either.”

“Good.” She sits back and her deep amber dress adjusts with her. It shimmers in the low light of the room. “What are your intentions for the girl?”

“I love her,” I blurt. The words tumble from my mouth without thinking. “I'm in love with her," I add to clarify, crossing my arms. “I’ll do whatever it takes to keep her safe.”

"Of that, I have no doubt.” She leans forward and pats me on the arm. “Now tell me your story from the beginning.”

“Okay,” I say slowly. Snow White isn’t in a hurry. So, I start with my earliest memory, thinking she’ll ask me to skip all of that, but she doesn’t. She listens intently, as though she has all the time in the world. When she’s unclear about something I say, she asks a question. At one point, she asks me to pause and then orders us a drink. The blood is delicious, and I thank her gratefully.

It’s more than an hour before I finish. “All I want is to stay with Wysteria. To love her and care for her. Nothing more.”

Snow finishes her goblet of blood. Sets it on the table. Then looks at me. “Thank you for your honesty. All you've said is sincere. I can feel it." She pauses. Eyes me in a way I don't understand. "There are things about yourself that you don’t know, but that I must tell you.”

“There is?” I’m confused but interested in what she has to say.

“The first thing is your family. Your uncle is on the elven throne, but he shouldn't be." She pauses, gauging my body language, and probably reading more. "How do you feel about that?"

I shrug. "I don't care about that stuff. I'm not interested in the elven royalty or where I might fit in."

"Well, your uncle does. Be aware of that in all future situations." She stands and walks over to one of her bookshelves. Pulls on a book. A secret door slides open. "Come here, please."

I follow her into a small room lined with all sorts of items, including a crown. Deep blue like the bottom of the sea, each sky-blue gem seems to radiate power. Snow picks it up. "This crown belongs to the true ruler of the elven realm. After Devoran was killed, it was brought to me, and I've kept it safe these many years. But I know who the true heir is."

"It isn't me, is it?" The idea of ruling over an entire group or nation terrifies me.

"No," she says, laughing lightly. Then her features become serious. "It's Wysteria."

I'm floored. Shocked for a moment. In the next, I believe her. And that freaks me out as well. Because if Wysteria and I marry like I want us to, that means I'll be king. "Great," I reply, trying to act supportive. It doesn't work. I know it, and so does Snow.

She pats me on the arm. "Your reaction is exactly as I hoped it would be. You are not power-hungry. You will make a great match for Wysteria."

I think about Snow White and her husband. His name is Dorian, I believe. He is King over all supernaturals, but he isn't in the spotlight much, and he doesn't seem to mind. More than that, he truly loves and supports Snow. If he can do it, maybe I can too. "Thank you," I say, keeping my teeth clenched. "I guess there's no way she can denounce her rightful claim on the throne?" Even as I say the words, I feel like a jerk. That isn't fair to her or the elven people.

"We all have a choice, Austin." I see a moment of sadness in her eyes. She does what she has to for the good of all supernaturals, but being her must be extremely difficult.

“It’s her destiny to rule, isn’t it?” I ask, only to hear Snow confirm what I already know.

She doesn’t respond right away, placing the crown back on its stand before crossing past me and leaving the room.

I trail behind, tucking my hands in my pockets.

As the secret door closes, she smiles. “It is her destiny, and I fear if she doesn’t take her place, the elven realm and those in it will cease to exist,” she says simply.

I roll my shoulders back. That’s a bold statement. Heavy with consequences. “Then I’ll do all I can to make sure it happens.”

This time when Snow smiles, she shows off her teeth, including her fangs. I suck in my breath. The woman is breathtaking in the immensity of her power. “That’s what I hoped you would say.” She returns to her desk but doesn’t sit. “Kneel, Austin.”

At her request, I sink to my knees. My pulse quickens until it’s all I can hear. Even though she seems willing to let me live, worry ebbs along my spine that she might change her mind and end my life anyway. Snow closes her eyes a moment. A voice inside my head demands I run away. Instead, I clamp my hands into fists and wait. Because there is no place to hide. Wherever I went, she would find me. Not only that but if it’s Wysteria’s calling to rule the elven realm, then it’s mine to be by her side. I know Wysteria won’t neglect her purpose, and neither will I.

Snow raises her head and closes her eyes. Behind her, two shadows appear. They seem to be separate entities as they swirl in and through the vampire queen. Incomprehensible whisperings fill the air with loud whispers. As quickly as the shadows appear, they vanish, and Snow opens her eyes. “Austin, I sanction you a vampire. With that comes all of my protection and powers.” Snow touches her ring fingers to either side of my head. There’s a flash of something red and blue.

“The power of the vampire hunter and the elf flows equally within you now.”

Like after I drank from Wysteria, I feel a physical change within my body, and I shudder even as my sight lasers in like a lens. It’s more than a physical shift. My sight is enhanced, sure, but I can see within as well and comprehend so much more. “What am I seeing?” I ask quietly. Behind Snow are what look like ghosts, but that can’t be possible.

“You now have true elven sight. With that comes the ability to see the dead. Use it wisely.” Snow smiles. “Wysteria also has a similar ability. The difference is she can call the dead forth if they are one of her ancestors. You have the ability to see the dead only if they want you too.”

As she speaks, an elven man who looks familiar comes over and tries to rest a hand on my arm. He doesn’t say a word, but I feel comforted by his presence.

“You can see Devoran?” She looks right at him.

“I can see someone. You see him too?” I force myself not to be afraid, but frick! Ghosts are real!

“I see a lot of things,” she says, pressing her lips together. “Devoran approves the gift you’ve been given.”

I look at the ghost. “Uh, thank you, sire?” It feels weird talking to the spirit of the dead, but it seems appropriate.

The elven king smiles. Then he vanishes, as do the others.

I sigh with relief, wishing I didn’t ever have to use that gift again. It feels more like a curse.

“Rise, Austin.” She pushes out her chair and sits, heavily.

I stand and cross my arms, unsure where to go.

She notices my behavior and indicates I have a seat. “Something else you should know is that Wysteria and I are related.” Snow watches me, not unkindly. More like she’s weary.

I can't imagine the burdens she must carry. "I—How?"

She waves a hand. "It's a long story, but it is true."

"I believe you," I say, hoping I haven't disrespected her.

She adjusts a few papers on her desk before meeting my gaze. "Good." She winks and I relax slightly. "Now that you've agreed to keep Wysteria safe and now that you're sanctioned, I have a job for you."

"Whatever it is, I'm in. I'll do anything for Wysteria," I say, and mean it.

"Excellent because your training begins now." She raises a hand, and a ball of red light appears in her palm before shooting into my chest.

Before that moment, I didn't realize the vampire queen still possessed magic. I think to ask her what she did to me, but my body gets heavy. Desperate to stay upright, I grind my teeth. Did she change her mind about killing me after all? As consciousness evaporates, my mind takes hold of an image of Wysteria. She's holding a paper in her hands, and tears leak from her eyes. I wonder what has her so sad. She sniffles and folds the paper, tucking it back in an envelope before picking up another. I see her name written in my handwriting and guess she somehow found the letters I wrote. For some reason, knowing she's reading them warms my heart. When I wrote them, I never thought she'd read them. But she is, which means she's alive, and though I don't know how, I can see that she is moved by my words just as she always inspired me.

I fight harder against the weight settling over my mind, but know I won't win. If this is the end, I sorrow for Wysteria. Me dying will hurt her and I don't want her to hurt ever again.

OceanofPDF.com

AUSTIN'S SUFFERING

WYSTERIA

I SPEND hours reading Austin's letters. It's like getting a glimpse into Austin's world and his soul while we were apart. Each letter is like a gift, revealing his growth, and strangely, I feel like I'm growing too. A combination of love and guilt churns around me. I know I have to tell Austin what I've done. At the same time, I can't stop reading them. Each letter deepens my love for him.

When I read the last one, I cry. The tears are for all the time I lost. For all that could've been. I weep over Austin's suffering. How alone he felt after I left and when his dad died. He suffered through a lot, and finally, I cry for both of us.

When I'm done, I repack the letters in my backpack before placing the stake on top. Then I try to call Austin. The sooner I get this guilt off my chest, the better. But he doesn't answer.

I text Sage. She doesn't answer either.

So, I decided to pull up my big-girl pants and finally call Christopher.

"Hello," he says after the first ring.

"Hey, Christopher." I swallow, surprised. Now that I have him, I'm unsure what to say. "I haven't heard from you in a while. How are you?"

He chuckles softly. "Good. Are you okay? No more panic attacks or dangerous situations?"

"Nope, no panic attacks, thankfully. But, um, I've done something, and I feel bad about it."

"What is it?" Worry tinges his voice.

"I took something I shouldn't have. Well, some things. Letters.

Austin wrote them to me while I was gone, and I found them in his room." I'm speaking rapidly, the way my heart is feeling. "I know I shouldn't have, but I was curious, and now I feel terrible."

Christopher releases a big breath. He's relieved, and I envy him. "It sounds like you and Austin need to talk. He should be back soon."

"You know where he is?" Talking to Christopher does help, at least a little. It's out in the open. I told someone, and the world didn't end.

"Yeah," he says but doesn't continue.

Vague much? I pull on my jacket and leave my room, heading to the elevator. "Where is he? He isn't hurt, is he?"

"No, Wys. He's fine. He's in Sharra. The Vampire Queen wanted to speak with him."

"She isn't going to kill him?" I ask, knowing he's unsanctioned, and that's the law.

"Definitely not. She has a plan for him," he quickly adds before I can freak out.

"Well, that's a relief, but what is it? What does she want with him?" I don't want her to take him away from me.

"I'm not sure," he says and pauses like someone on his end is speaking with him.

While I wait, I exit the elevator and walk through the lobby and outside.

Darkness has settled over the campus. The sidewalk is lit by glowing streetlamps. I step into the street, crossing quickly as a car speeds past. Then hop onto the sidewalk and start toward the practice room. I need to spend time on the duet Austin, and I have to perform.

"Wys, I have to go. Leva is on her way back to you, so be on the lookout. Talk again soon?" Christopher sounds distracted.

"Sure." I feel like there's something wrong between us. Something I'm not understanding. "But… Are you mad at me?"

"No. Not at all. Why would you think that, sis?"

I may be imagining the tension. “It feels like you’re keeping something from me.”

“Wys, I’m sorry. It isn’t you. I—” He pauses. “Just know it isn’t you. Not at all. I’ll call you again soon. Promise.”

“Okay.” What else can I say to that? Nothing.

“Wys, I love you,” he adds. His voice is tender, and I know he means it.

“Love you too, Chris.” I hang up and tuck my phone in the back pocket of my jeans and unzip my bag, bringing it around the front, so if for some reason I need the stake, it’s within reaching distance. At that same time, I feel stupid. People are walking by, laughing and talking. The night is chilly, but the sky is clear. Nothing sinister is afoot. Yet, I still can’t shake my need to be prepared.

Up ahead and to my right, a couple is making out on a bench. One has her head back and looks familiar. When I’m closer, I can see it’s my roommate, Sage, and she doesn’t look right. She looks unconscious. Her eyes are closed, and her mouth is partway open. Some might see it as passion, but something is off. “Sage,” I whisper. Trusting my gut, I remove the stake from my backpack and let my bag fall.

At the noise, the girl at Sage’s neck lifts her eyes and stares right at me. It’s then I see she’s drinking from Sage. Damn vampire! Without thinking, I rush her.

She’s quicker than me, and she stands, wiping her mouth before smiling. “You’re next, bitch.” She comes to me slowly as though she knows she has nothing to fear. Her dark hair is feathered back like one of the Charlie’s Angels from the seventies, and she’s wearing all leather. She flashes her fangs and moves to grab me by the neck, lifting me off the ground.

“No,” I shout and stab her in the shoulder with everything I’ve got.

Her eyes get wide, and she loosens her grip. “Are you serious?” She lets me go and reaches over, grabbing the stake and pointing it at me. It's covered in her blood. "You're going to pay for that." She flashes her fangs.

I stand there like my feet are cemented into the concrete and wait for the end. My parents trained me when I was young, but it's been a while.

Before she can use the stake against me, there's a whoosh, like a machete through a coconut, and the vampire's head slides off her body.

Someone screams.

Then another.

There's shouting.

All I can do is focus on the vampire body dropping to the ground. Blood rushes from the place where her head used to be, and then she turns to ash, crumbles apart, and is gone—her remnants taken by the ever-present Wyoming wind.

"Are you alright?"

I look up. It's my English teacher, Ms. Spears. "Yeah," I say, wrapping my arms around myself. Confusion. Gratefulness. And a whole slew of other emotions rushes through me.

Ms. Spears picks up my stake and hands it to me. "I saw what you did. You're pretty good with that thing." She takes a cloth from the oversized bag draped over her shoulder and wipes off her blade. Then sheaths it and tucks it away. It's then she notices all of the students surrounding us.

I'm still in shock and stare without moving at the weapon in my hand. It doesn't feel like it belongs to me.

"Everyone move along. There's nothing to see." Ms. Spears flashes her teaching credentials, which all teachers are required to carry.

The small crowds disperse. Some leave, but many linger.

"Hey," she shouts. "I have most of you in one of my classes. You want an F for the semester, stick around." Each word comes out clipped. Without a doubt, she's serious. She'll give them a failing grade as surely as she slayed that vampire.

"She can't do that," someone whispers.

Ms. Spears whirls around, facing the one who spoke. She's a taller girl with dark hair and angry eyes. "Heather, right?"

The girl gasps, covering her mouth, her eyes terrified.

"You're taking Advanced Writing. If I remember correctly, and I do, you need to pass that class to graduate."

Heather's mouth falls open, and she tucks her hands into her front pockets.

"Go, or you fail my class," Ms. Spears barks.

The girl spins on her heel.

"Anyone else?" Spears is scanning the crowd. "Ethan? Will? Trent? Brenda?"

As she says their names, they take off. Even though I'm not a fan of my English teacher, she's got quite the memory.

"Shall I continue?" She glares at those few who are sticking around.

A few students are rebellious and stubborn enough to stay. "Very well, I have a photographic memory. Let's see what exactly I can and cannot do, shall we?"

The rest of the group reluctantly leaves, but one guy asks quietly, "Is a teacher allowed to kill supernaturals like that?"

"Listen, you little twerp, a student's life was threatened. That vampire was about to drain her dry. I had every right to protect students, especially when the law is broken on campus. Now, go!" Ms. Spears steps toward him and the others.

They scatter as someone says, "It's true what everyone says about her. She really is witchy."

I can't deny it. More than witchy, Ms. Spears is terrifying. In a lot of ways, she's scarier than the vampire. I glad she's on my side—or, at least she was. I'm still her student.

It's then I remember Sage. She's lying on the bench, her eyes closed, her face pale. She looks dead in the pale light shining from the streetlamp. "Sage. Oh my gosh, Sage. Can you hear me?" I run over. Blood oozes from the twin wounds at her neck. Without thinking, I place a hand over them. Immediately, my powers ignite, and an indigo light emanates from my hand and into my roommate. "Come on, Sage. You're not allowed to be anything except okay."

After several long minutes, she moans, and her eyes blink open. "Wys," she says softly.

I let out a sob of relief. "Yeah, it's me. You scared me half to death," I say, then glance around, nervous about revealing my power out in the open. Thankfully everyone is gone except Ms. Spears. She's watching me with a strange look on her face.

"It's true what I've heard about you then?" Ms. Spears asks.

I shrug, trying to act nonchalant even though that isn't how I'm feeling. "I guess." I turn away, focusing back on Sage.

My roommate tries to sit but is still too weak.

"Stay where you are, and rest for a few." I squeeze Sage's hand before walking over to my English teacher.

We stare at each other for several long moments. I don't want to reveal anything she doesn't already know. Plus, I'm not sure I trust her.

"Have you heard of the Supernatural Task Force?" she finally asks.

"Of course," I say.

"Well, I think you'd make an excellent candidate. Why don't you come by my office tomorrow night around six-thirty, and we can discuss the requirements for entry."

I want to ask her more about it. Because I'm definitely interested. My parents belonged, and I feel like I should too. "You can get me in

—” I begin.

Spears holds up a hand. “Your friend needs you right now. We’ll talk more tomorrow.”

“Alright,” I say, frustration oozing from my pores. She isn’t wrong, though. Sage does need my help. “Thanks.”

Ms. Spears gives me a bland smile before cutting across the grass and into the night.

OceanofPDF.com

OVERINDULGE

WYSTERIA

I PICK UP MY BAG, shove the bloody stake into some slushy snow to rinse it, and then tuck it into the front pocket of my bag, so I don't ruin my letters. Then I hurry over to Sage, who's sitting up, though she still seems a little vacant. I'm wondering if it's drugs again. "Can you stand?" I ask, holding out my arm.

She takes it and rises, though I feel her frame shake. "I'm fine," she says, slurring her words.

My worry intensifies into anger. "Drugs are stupid," I say. "Hell, even alcohol is stupid. If I've learned one thing since I got here, it's that people are afraid. And instead of dealing with their fear, they bury it in alcohol or drugs." I wrap an arm around her waist. "So damn stupid."

Sage snorts, looking at me. "Duh! Isn't that why you overindulge every time you partake?"

I let out a heavy sigh. The last time I went to a party, I only had one drink. But I wasn't going to correct her because, yeah, alcohol does take off the edge—at least until it wears off. No surprise, my problems, fears, worries, and troubles are still there, as prevalent as before. "I just want you to be alright."

"I'm fine," she says loudly.

I grind my teeth together. Sage isn't fine, not at all. She's hurting. I know it, and deep down, she knows it too. "You need to talk to your parents," I say softly.

She stops and looks at me. Her eyes fill with tears.

Mentally, I'm preparing myself for a tongue-lashing. She's going to lose it on me, and I can't blame her. "I will," she says. Her shoulders slump, and she leans against me.

“You’ll talk to your parents?” I ask, to verify she understood what I said.

She sniffles and wipes her eyes. “Yes, I’m going…” Whatever she intends to say dies in her throat as we reach the end of the sidewalk. There are students outside, and we no longer have privacy. I help her cross the street and through the lobby of Irvine Hall. When we reach the elevator, we have to wait with a half dozen other students. Some give us strange looks, but I ignore them.

Once we’re inside our room, I help Sage to her bed. “Are you sick?” I ask, just to verify.

She nods her head. “But not in the way you think. My soul hurts.”

“What can I do?” It’s hard to see strong Sage crying and looking so small and broken.

“Help me pack a bag.”

“Sure.” I go over to her closet and get her duffel bag.

From her bed, Sage instructs me to shove some jeans and shirts and almost regular shoes into it as well as undies, a brush, and other toiletries. When I finish, I hand it to her. “When are you going to leave?”

She sits, running a hand over her face. “Might as well get this over with.”

Part of me thinks she should wait until she’s sober. Another part wonders if she’ll back out if she remains, so I nod. “How are you going to get there?” I don’t know much about realm jumping. Only what Leva did when we left Redyrin’s realm and landed in this one.

She goes to her jewelry box and removes a necklace I’ve seen in there before, but she never wore. It’s red and looks like a giant teardrop. She puts it around her neck and stands. Then faces me. “I’m coming back,” she says, placing her hands on my shoulders. “Don’t give away my room or anything.”

I smile as my eyes water. “I never would,” I say and mean it.

“You don’t think I’m an outrageous bitch?” She asked me that question a few days after we met. It was sincere then, and it is now.

“Definitely not a bitch, and your outrageousness is my favorite thing about you.” I pull her into a hug.

She wraps her arms around my waist and buries her head in my shoulder. “Thank Wys.” I appreciate her using my nickname. At the same time, I realize I’m not sad about my mom and dad anymore, especially since I can see them whenever I want.

Sage releases me and moves into the middle of the room. “I’m going to see if I can use the realm traveling spell inside even though I know they’ve spelled the dorms to block any super-powerful magic.”

“Come back when you can,” I say. “I’ll be waiting.”

“I will.” She holds the pendant in her hand and closes her eyes.

At first, nothing happens. Before I can suggest we go outside and try again there, the air between us begins to swirl. An opening appears. The center is dark and ominous like the bottom of a well. The edges are filled with light and the colors of the seven magics.

Sage sighs with relief. Gives me a small smile of gratitude. And steps through, leaving me alone.

I’m debating whether to get started on the piles of homework I’ve put off. Before I can sit at my desk, someone taps lightly on the door. Unsure who it could be, I grab my stake and open it a crack. It’s Leva.

“Hi,” I say, my face lighting up as I widen the opening.

“Wysteria.” She smiles and flies forward, her arms outspread as she flings herself into my cheek.

I laugh. “It’s good to see you. Are you staying a while this time?” I still can’t believe I ever told her I didn’t want her with me at college. I’ve missed her so much.

She flies backward, her teal wings changing to pale yellow as her smile dies. “I had to see you and make sure for myself that you’re okay. But I can only stay for tonight. The Vampire Queen needs me…”

She pauses and flies close to my ear. “I have to go to the elven realm,” she says and then flies back so I can see her.

“What for?” Abernathy said the elven king is dangerous, and I’m worried about her.

She presses a finger to her lips and shakes her head.

So she can’t talk about it? “Fine. But you can hang out with me tonight, right?”

“Yep.” Her smile returns.

“What should we do?”

Leva’s wings and hair turn the brightest fuchsia. “I’ve always wanted to go to a college party in the human realm.” She clasps her hands together, and her eyes fill with excitement.

I hold out my hand, and she lands, her hands on her hips.

“Well, then we better find one, pronto,” I say.

OceanofPDF.com

SUPERNATURAL MADNESS

WYSTERIA

WHEN I WAKE, Leva is already gone. Our night out partying was fun and uneventful mainly because Leva used magic to change my hair color to black, and I wore it in twin buns high on my head. No one recognized me. I wanted to leave it that way for a while, but the magic has already worn off.

Oh well.

After getting ready in the communal bathroom, I head over to the cafeteria for breakfast. It's still early, so the room is empty. I fill my plate with scrambled eggs, toast, and bacon. Once I finish, I go back to my room and work on homework. I'm so far behind, and I wonder if I'll ever catch up. I came to college to be normal, but it hasn't happened. The days blurring into supernatural madness. I'm probably failing half my classes. The duet with Austin will mean nothing if I can't get passing grades on the rest of the subjects.

I work through lunch and dinner, just eating some jerky to keep me going. By nightfall, my eyes are blurry, and my brain hurts, but at least I made a dent and submit a bunch of work to my teachers. A late score is better than a zero.

At six, I close my laptop and my books and slide on my tan ballet flats. Before leaving my room, I debate whether to bring my bag along with the letters and my stake and decide I definitely should.

There's only me in the elevator, which is odd. Once I reach the lobby, I take my time, listening for possible dangers. Nothing strikes me as I cross to the exit. I wave at the girl sitting at the front desk. She waves back.

Everything is fine, I think, but tighten my grasp on the bag strap and push the door open. It's cold outside, and I pull the hood of my oversized sweatshirt onto my head and pick up the pace. Ms. Spears's office is a good fifteen-minute walk. As I go, my thoughts turn to Sage. Hopefully, with her parents' help, she'll get better and be back soon. I already miss her terribly. She's a big personality in a tiny package, and our little room fills empty without her in it.

Even though it's dark, I stay in the light from the streetlamps until I reach the Mikesell Building. Inside, the warmth from the heaters causes my shoulders to relax. Since it's after hours, some of the lights are off. Those that are still on cast shadows, and an eeriness settles over me.

Ms. Spears's office is on the third floor, and I make my way over to the stairs. My shoes echo on the marble floors as I climb. When I see the sign for Ms. Spears's office, I pull open the door and head down the hall. There are fewer lights up here.

In the distance, I notice the shadow of a person and slow.

"Hey, Wysteria."

It's Evan. I lift a hand in greeting, though I'm not happy to see him. I never liked Evan and probably never will. Evan seems jumpy, his hands twitchy like he's on something. His hair is going every which way, and his shirt half untucked, which is so not Evan. "Everything okay?" I ask, more out of concern for my own safety.

"None of your damn business, Pudgy Wudgy." He turns right, heading down another hall.

"Great." I stay the course until I reach Ms. Spears's office. There's a light on, and I knock softly.

Immediately, the door swings open. The man standing there looks like a lumberjack in plaid with a grizzly beard—either that or a linebacker. Either apply. He takes up the whole entrance.

"I'm looking for Ms. Spears," I say, trying not to let my voice quiver.

Before he can respond, Ms. Spears comes around, pushing Lumberjack out of the way. "Bard, don't be a brute and move out of the way." She shoves him lightly.

"Yes, ma'am." The big guy moves from my view.

Ms. Spears smiles. It's a little off-putting, especially since it isn't something she often does. "Wysteria. Right on time." She stands to the side and waves me in, then moves over to her desk. "Have a seat." Piles and piles of paper, folders, pens, and markers are scattered across the top like an English warzone.

Bard closes the door, and I suddenly feel trapped. Swallowing, I cross my arms. "Thanks for seeing me," I say.

"Of course." She rolls her way under her desk, picks up some papers, and moves them off to the side. It doesn't do anything to help the mess, just shifts it. "You are doing okay after last night?" she asks.

"Sure. Fine," I say, doing my best to dash the strange feeling fluttering inside my stomach.

"Good. And how is your friend? Sage, isn't it?" She clasps her hands together, flashing her blood-red nail polish.

"Yes." I take a millimeter of a second to debate whether to tell Ms. Spears the truth about what's become of Sage. I decide against it. "She's hanging in there," I finish.

"Excellent. Excellent." She taps her hands on the desk as her eyes zero on me. "You've missed more than a few classes. Are you still interested in attending college, or are you ready to train in the Supernatural Task Force full time?"

The question has me frazzled. I hadn't thought about making a choice. "I can't do both?"

She releases a harsh laugh. "At the moment, you aren't doing one successfully. What makes you think you can handle college and training?"

Ouch. But she isn't wrong. "True," I say, staring at my hands.

"How about I help you get caught up on your schoolwork, and then we can talk about the Task Force after freshman year?" She stands like we're done talking.

"But I thought you were going to tell me how to apply?"

"Well, I was," she says, coming around and leaning against the desk. "Then I saw how far behind you are and your schoolwork and figured we should focus on fixing that first. Snow White will look at your grades. You don't want to be a disappointment, do you?"

Her words come out sweet, but they are brutally painful. "I guess," I say.

"Good. Let me speak with your other teachers, and then I'll email you a game plan for getting caught up."

"If you're sure you don't mind."

"Not at all." She walks to the door. Opens it. Then does something bizarre and shuts off the light. It's then I notice her table lamp is on and it gives the room an eerie glow.

"Are you leaving too?" I ask, feeling edgy once again.

"In a moment." She takes my hand. Squeezes and speaks the words to a spell. One I've heard before.

Confusion rushes through me even as my body starts to go numb. Determined to do something to save myself, I grab hold of the bear bracelet and rip it from my wrist. The action hurts, but I couldn't cry out even if I wanted to. My body is paralyzed, and I start to fall back. The brutish man, Bard, catches me from behind and throws me over his shoulder. He's so tall. I can see Ms. Spears walk back around to her desk, open the top drawer, and removes a knife. It's familiar, and I quickly recognize it as the same one Doug used to cut me.

Somehow it's been spelled or enchanted and unlike most other mortal weapons, this one can cut me.

She moves, so we are only inches apart, her eyes holding mine. "It's always good to play the long game," Ms. Spears says. As she speaks, she shifts from my English teacher and into Redyrin. Up close, I can see the cracks in her skin. The way it's beginning to sag, and the gray in her hair. She's aging and in desperate need of my magic.

I have so many questions. Because, according to Austin, Ms. Spears has been teaching at the university for a while. How did she do that and live in her realm with me? There were times when she was absent, her excuse was hunting or collecting items, like new clothes, blankets, spices, and other necessities. I never imagined she crossed realms to teach. Frazzled, I try to open my mouth and ask her how, but it isn't necessary.

"I figured you'd escape at some point," she says, tapping my nose with the edge of the blade.

Blood is rushing to my head at being bent over Bard's shoulder. My head is pounding.

"I've been teaching at Gothel Springs University for going on five years." She rolls her eyes. "Crossing realms so often sucked a lot out of me but that's why I have you." She smiles. "But teaching?" She waves her hands around the room, finally acknowledging her messy desk. "It's awful. Kids today are stupid on a cellular level."

From what I've seen, that isn't true. Everyone around me seems immensely smart and infinitely more savvy than most.

Redyrin goes on, "It's been a total pain in the ass to spend time in both realms, but worth it. Especially now." She grabs hold of my wrist and cuts a small gash into my arm, then licks the blood that rushes out. Immediately, she's restored and looking like the Redyrin I remember. She checks the mirror hanging on the wall beside her window. "Much better," she says and continues, "That's why I hired the idiot vampire, Doug, to help me out. Gary too." She clucks her tongue as she watches me in the mirror. Then goes back to rearranging her dark hair. When she's finished, she turns. "I appreciate your predictability. Always did, my dear." She comes in close and kisses my cheek. "Now, be a good girl for mommy and bleed."

I want to kick and scream. Spit in her face and tell her to stay the hell away from me, but the spell she put on me—the same one she used on me in her realm when I disobeyed—has me completely incapacitated.

"Are we going back to the other realm now?" Bard asks.

"In a moment," Redyrin snaps.

"Okay." Bard shifts me on his shoulder.

Redyrin closes her eyes and holds her hands with the palms up, the blade laying across both. She closes her hands around the knife and says words I don't understand. Blood oozes from the hand clutching the dagger. It's red and sizzles before changing to black and dissipating into a smoky cloud. With each drop of blood, the smoke grows bigger until I can no longer see her hands.

Bard begins to chant the words with her, but I doubt he even knows what they mean. The air fills with the stench of burning flesh consumed by evil magic. And still, I wait, wishing there was something I could do to help myself. Knowing that if she takes me this time, I will never escape. It feels hopeless, and as I watch her, I can't help thinking about Austin. My love for him and all we could've been together.

My heart aches at all I'm losing, but I can't even cry.

Finally, Redyrin opens her eyes. They flash black before returning to her natural color. She smiles, and it's so eerie, my insides shudder. "It's done," she says, her voice low.

The smoke dissipates, revealing the knife is gone and is now a seven-pointed crown. The metal looks like it's made up of silver and gold snakes. They swirl together within and up into the points.

I wonder why she created a crown for herself, especially one so clunky. Instead of placing it on her head, she shoves it on mine. Immediately it feels like thousands of tiny needles lock into my head. I want to cry out in pain, but my mouth won't work. Blood oozes from each pinprick, and I expect to see it drip onto the floor at any moment. But it doesn't. It's like the crown is taking my blood into itself—like the metal snakes are sucking my blood.

"Wysteria, I must thank you for escaping. You inspired me to take the next step and find a way to create this crown. It isn't like any utilized before. Because this crown connects you through magic to me." Even as she speaks, a crown exactly like mine appears on the inside of her wrist. She hisses in pain as invisible needles tattoo it slowly onto her skin. But it isn't silver and gold. Instead, it's indigo blue, the color of my magic. "You see," she says triumphantly, her eyes flicking from her wrist to me. "Your blood is mine forever and always." She laughs, and I want nothing more than to shrink away. "As soon as it's finished, we will return home."

"And I can play with puppies?" Bard asks.

I hear the smile on his face.

Redyrin glares and rolls her eyes. "Don't be an idiot."

OceanofPDF.com

HOVERING LIKE GHOSTS

WYSTERIA

I WATCH in horror as the crown continues to materialize on Redyrin's wrist. In my heart, I'm pleading for help. Someone somewhere will rescue me. But there isn't anyone. Christopher is away in the land of Sharra, along with Austin. Even my roommate Sage is there while Leva has gone to the elven realm. There's only me. Alone in the human realm.

I can't help a flash of anger. They all knew I was in danger. Cindy cast a spell on me. Snow and Christopher, and Leva wanted to protect me by keeping me prisoner in Sharra. Yet when it matters most, I'm alone.

How could they?

If they cared the way they said they did, then they would've protected me. I can't help wondering if it's all a lie. If they each had their own selfish reasons for helping me, and it had nothing to do with the way they feel about me.

The next moment, my anger turns to despair. I feel beyond alone. It's then I think about Abernathy and the gift he awakened in me. In my mind, I think about my parents, longing to see them, to have them near me.

And suddenly they are there. Hovering like the ghosts they are in the air above Redyrin's desk. My mom comes to me and tries to help. My dad follows suit, but there's nothing they can do. My despair deepens because bringing there here is doing nothing but causing pain. That was selfish.

I long to tell them I'm sorry, but whatever Redyrin did to me, I still can't move. It's a wonder I'm breathing. My mom looks at my dad, and they hug before vanishing.

Again, I'm alone.

If only I could close my eyes and block out everything around me. I try and feel my lids flinch, but before I can do more, the door to Redyrin's office is flung open.

Evan and his dad, Linroe, rush into the room.

"There you are," Linroe says, angling himself to he's right behind Redyrin.

She was too focused on the tattoo, and Linroe quickly gets the upper hand, grunting as he moves in closer to Redyrin.

There's a sucking sound. Redyrin's eyes get big. She looks down as a deep red circle of blood blooms like a deadly rose on her pink blouse.

I don't know for sure, but I think Linroe stabbed Redyrin. That's my guess, not that it'll do any good. Now that Redyrin has my blood flowing in her veins or will once the tattoo is complete, it'll be beyond challenging to kill her.

"Die, bitch," Linroe says, grunting again.

"No," Bard shouts, reaching out his tree stump arms to tackle Evan, but Evan is quick and steps out of his grasp, swinging the ax in his hands directly into Bard's chest. It sounds like a shovel in wet dirt, and I cringe.

Bard groans, stepping back, the heel of his boot coming within inches of crushing my face.

Evan doesn't hesitate and hits Bard again, this time slamming it into Bard's thick neck. Blood splatters everywhere as the big man falls to his knees. The ax didn't sever his head completely off, but it dangles there. I want to puke at the sight of so much gore.

I return my focus to Linroe and Redyrin. She seems to have the upper hand, even though Linroe stabbed her twice. She shoots a spell his way, but the magic doesn't seem to affect him. "You can't kill me, you stupid fools." A ball of black light appears in her hand, and she starts to speak, but before she can utter a single word, Evan swings the ax, chopping off Redyrin's head.

In horror, I watch her body slump to the ground followed by her head. Blood is suddenly everywhere, including some spatter on my clothes, face, and hands.

Immediately the magical hold she has on me vanishes. The crown releases itself from my head and drops to the floor with a sickening thud, rolling until it bumps into Redyrin's silent body. I am in shock. Redyrin is dead. Just like that? Her face is frozen in horror like she can't believe it either. Shouldn't I feel relief? She held me prisoner for years, using me, keeping me from the human realm and my family. As I stare at her face, my only sensation is sadness for a life wasted over her need for power, youth, vitality—all of it.

Sure, Redyrin would have imprisoned me again. The half fashioned tattoo on her wrist, as well as the crown she created, proves her wicked intentions. Tears sting my eyes at this chapter of my life ending so abruptly. I didn't get to tell her off. The whole situation feels unreal, like I'm dreaming, and at any second she'll become whole once again and finish what she started.

Linroe whisper-shouts something to Evan. They are distracted, discussing what to do about Redyrin and Bard's bodies. I wipe my eyes and sit up straight. I am still in danger. Linroe and Evan are blocking the door and won't let me leave willingly. So, I take my shot, jump up, and run over to the window. As fast as I can, I unlock it and shout, "Help. Please. Someone help me! Hel—"That's all I get out before Evan grabs me from behind, covering my mouth with his hands. I immediately push out my power, searching for any goodness in Austin's cousin. There isn't any—only a longing for power. I bite down on his middle finger.

He releases me, and I run back to the window. "Help," I shout again.

"Bitch bit me," Evan says.

“I don’t give a shit. Tie her up and let’s get out of here,” Linroe says.

“Fine.” Evan drops the ax and pulls rope from his back pocket, but he doesn’t get a chance to tie me up.

“What’s going on here?” It’s a security guard, one hand on his radio, the other going for his baton.

“John Went, is that you?” Linroe asks.

“Yeah.” He’s uncertain. I hear it in his voice. Probably because there is a lot of blood on Linroe and Evan and around the room, not to mention two dead bodies.

I should say something, but I’m distracted by two slithering voices.

“Wysteria,” one of them hisses.

“You must claim us,” another insists.

I glance around, surprised I can hear the voices when no one else around until I realize they aren’t coming from the room but inside my head. My eyes catch hold of the crown. The snakes still writhe around within, but they are no longer silver and gold. Instead, they are indigo, the exact color of my power. Instantly, I know it’s the snakes that are speaking.

What are you saying? I ask, but only in my mind.

This crown was created for you.

The witch, Redyrin, didn’t understand the real power within us, but wearing the crown will allow you to take your rightful place on the throne.

I’m hyper-focused on the snakes, still curious about how I’m hearing them but guessing it’s because of the hundreds of needle marks (bite marks) inflicted around my head from the first time I wore it. What throne?

The elven realm is yours to claim.

You are the rightful heir.

Take what belongs to you.

Before it's too late.

My thoughts are swimming with questions, but one thing is sure. I don't want the throne.

If you don't claim us, then someone else will.

And the elven realm will be swallowed up in evil.

It is already slowly dying.

You must listen to us, Rapunzel.

It's your destiny!

I don't like that they even know my first name. Plus, I hate when people use the D-word. I'm reasonably certain it wasn't my destiny to spend seven years as a prisoner, yet I did. Beyond that, my only destiny is to love Austin and be loved by him in return.

At the same time, I don't want anyone else claiming this crown. I sense that would be bad, especially if Evan or Linroe got ahold of it. So I take hold of the crown. As soon as my fingers brush against the cold metal, I feel it prick against my flesh.

Place us on your head.

Let us show you the truth.

Almost in a trance, I do as the voices say and set the cold blue metal on my head. It secures itself by piercing me a hundred times over and all at once. To stifle the pain, I bite into my cheek. There is a difference this time. When Redyrin put it on my head, I felt my power draining from me and into her. Now, I feel my power increase, as though the crown is amplifying what I have inside.

I turn to see my reflection in the mirror. The indigo crown seems to pulsate and slither, and it stands out starkly against my blond hair. Without thought, I adjust it, so it's straight. It doesn't move under my touch, but it shifts on its own when I lower my hands.

Behind me, there's a whimper, pulling me from my reflection.

Upon turning, I watch the security guard crumple to the ground. Before I can do anything, Evan presses something into my neck.

Immediately, I'm conscious but incapable of moving as though whatever spell Redyrin used on me has been freshly injected. It frustrates the hell out of me, and my anger burns, causing my power to flare to life. But my power isn't a weapon, it's used to heal, and I'm still unable to move. As my knees buckle, Evan lifts me over his shoulder. I want to pound my fists against his back. Make him put me down and leave me alone.

Evan groans under the weight. He isn't half as beefy as the Linebacker who held me in the same position not so long ago. "Hurry, she's heavy," Evan says, his breathing coming in sporadic spurts under my weight.

Serves him right, I think, trying to make myself feel heavier.

"Don't rush me, boy," his father responds. "We have to do this right. I want my rightful place in the kingdom." As he speaks, there's a flash of light and what sounds like running water. "My brother will give me back what is mine once he sees I've brought him the fountain of youth."

Linroe is talking about me. I'm the fountain of youth. Just a pawn in someone else's scheme, same as it was with Redyrin. Thinking of my pretend mother fills my heart with sorrow. She did horrible things to me, but I can't help feeling a sense of loss that she's gone. Whether or not she was good, she was a part of my life for seven years.

"I hope so," Evan says, interrupting my thoughts. He doesn't sound convinced, but he walks forward, and suddenly we are passing through the portal that takes us from the human realm and into what I'm guessing is the realm of the elves.

As we go, the snakes begin to whisper. Their words are low, and it's impossible to know what they are saying.

OceanofPDF.com

LIKE A CAT

AUSTIN

"THE SUPERNATURAL TASK FORCE is not for the faint of heart," Dorian said. The man is Snow's husband. I didn't think he did anything except support his wife. Apparently, I was wrong. He knew how to wield any weapon and was good at all of them. Lethal is the word that keeps coming to mind.

It's just Dorian and me in the enormous gymnasium, and each step echoes. My teacher holds a katana, and so do I. We circle each other. Each one of Dorian's steps feels practiced. Mine are less so.

Dorian goes on. "As a supernatural, it might feel wrong to hunt and kill our own kind. That is a fallacy brought on by those corrupt supernaturals. They will feed off our kindness and fears if we let them." He steps forward and swings down his sword with speed similar to that of a vampire.

I block at the last moment, and our swords clash, sending sparks into the low lit room.

"Good," Dorian says, stepping back. The man is over six feet with sandy-blond hair and eyes. While Dorian is leaner than Christopher, the two of them could be brothers. I can't help thinking about their similarities as I watch him move, lithe like a cat. Because I know Dorian doesn't like Christopher. Snow White made it clear I shouldn't mention the vampire while I trained, especially if I want him to teach and not just kick my ass.

I accidentally mentioned Chris once a few weeks ago and received the full brunt of his anger. Needless to say, I didn't make the same mistake again.

He lunges, and I block him, then grab his arm and yank him forward, and I move to the side. With him off balance, I kick him in the back and leap, landing with the blade at his neck as he falls to the ground. It's the first time I've gotten the upper hand with the man. It isn't surprising. He's been distracted. "Got you," I say, stepping out of the way and holding out my free hand.

He takes it. At the last second, I see the glint in his eyes, and he drop-kicks me over him. Rising, and sticking the blade to my neck, drawing blood. "The enemy never drops his guard. That means you never drop your guard, got it?"

I nod, careful not to make a sudden movement.

"Good." He moves the blade and holds out his hand, but I don't have to be told twice. With vampire speed, I stand and ready myself. "Excellent."

Snow is suddenly in the doorway closest to us. "It's time," she says.

"For what?" I ask. In the weeks since I started training in Sharra, I haven't been allowed to contact the outside world. The only people I've seen are Dorian and Snow. That's it. Once I asked about Christopher, but that was the time I got my ass kicked.

Dorian bows, the sign our lesson is over. I do the same, then follow him over to the rack where we keep the weapons. Snow comes in, the door clicking slightly, indicating her presence. She cordially smiles as she moves like air until she's standing next to her husband. They've been married a long time, yet I can still feel the sexual tension between them. Their love is strong—eternal. I hope to have that same kind of bond with Wysteria.

Snow takes Dorian's hand. He kisses her deeply a moment. Turns to me and flicks his chin in acknowledgment, and strides without another word out of the gym. When the vampire queen and I are alone, I swallow nervously. "What is it?"

"Christopher is waiting for you in your room. You and he have a mission." She crosses her arms as she starts toward the same exit Dorian just went through.

“Great. Where are we going? Can I see Wysteria first?” I’m excited to get out of Sharra, out of the training facility. More than anything, I’m desperate to see Wysteria. Last I heard, she was okay, and she’d been told where I am. But that doesn’t change the fact that I want her in my arms.

Snow eyes me shrewdly. “There’s been a change. Wysteria…” She doesn’t finish as she rests a hand on my arm.

It doesn’t register that her hand is ice cold. All I can think about is Wysteria. “Is she okay?”

“She’s been taken and is being held prisoner in the elven realm.”

I’m in shock, stunned. “How long?”

“A couple of weeks,” the vampire queen admits.

“What the hell?” I run my hands through my hair. “Why didn’t you tell me? Why have you kept me here?”

“Austin, you need to remain calm. She is alive. Leva keeps us updated, and we know that much.” Her features harden. “We needed to make sure you wouldn’t die rescuing her. You weren’t ready then, but the last two weeks you’ve trained nonstop, and you are now, which is exactly why I’m telling you about her.”

Anger causes my power, the one I received after drinking Wysteria’s blood, to flare to life. I can sense Snow is telling me the truth. Still, I can’t calm down. “When do we leave?”

“Tonight,” Snow says, patting me on the back. “Christopher has you ready to go.”

“Great.” We use our vampire speed and exit the training center. In seconds, we are down the road, and pass through several fields until we reach a wide stream.

At the base of the bridge, Snow presses a hand on my shoulder. “Austin,” Snow says.

Anxious, I slow beside her. “What?” I snap and then remember who I’m addressing. Bowing my head, I try again. “Yes?”

She doesn't respond right away but looks beyond the field to a forest of trees. A flock of birds take flight, singing and calling to each other like nothing is wrong. "This task won't be easy. Your uncle, Evan, and the king of the elves will be expecting you, and they won't stop until they have what they want. As soon as they get it, they won't need you anymore, so be prepared." She faces me then. "You understand this isn't a game? Your life is in lethal danger?" Her gaze intensifies.

I don't want to believe her, but I know she isn't lying. "Of course," I say without blinking. It's then I realize she and Dorian didn't keep the truth from me all this time because they are selfish or arrogant, but because they are worried about my safety. At that knowledge, I redirect my anger from her and Dorian to the elven king and those holding Wysteria hostage. "I have to go anyway. I would rather die fighting to save the woman I love than to remain safe and oblivious and without Wysteria." I say the words through clenched teeth, thinking she must understand. The way Snow and Dorian are around each other; without a doubt, they would make the same choices I'm about to.

We start running again and don't stop until we reach the building where my room is located. Inside, we cross the foyer and head down the hall until we are at my door. "I know, Austin. And that is why I gave you the task. That is also why Christopher will be going with you. Please understand there is no imprisonment for the elven king. He will fight you to the death." Snow gives me an intense look, one that is begging me to comprehend the seriousness of the situation, not that I wasn't already. I know what she's saying, and while I don't want anyone else to die, most of all, I will save Wysteria whatever the cost. She'd already been imprisoned for seven years. That she's in prison again burns me up inside.

Snow continues, "Whether you live or die, the decisions you make in the elven realm will change the rest of your life."

She seems overly dramatic, not that I'd ever say that out loud. "I understand," I say and unlock my door.

Snow smiles, though it's one of melancholy, not joy. "I hope to see you again soon, Austin. It's been a pleasure getting to know you. Christopher was right when he saved you. Vampire or no, you are one of the good guys."

"Thank you, your highness." I open the door.

Before I can get inside, two vampire guards glide down the hall. They are afraid. It's easy to see by the looks in their eyes.

"What is it?" Snow asks.

"Trolls," one of them whispers.

"Hundreds of them," another says. "They are dressed for battle."

Snow looks at me, nods, and then turns back to her guards. "Let's go."

"Should I stay and help?" I call after her.

"No, fulfill your mission Austin," the vampire queen responds without turning.

OceanofPDF.com

YANK IT AWAY

WYSTERIA

THE POISONOUS MAGIC injected into my veins wears off slowly. As feeling returns and I become more alert, I'm mindful of the cold. So cold. My body shivers to keep itself from shutting down. When I open my eyes, I immediately wish I didn't. There's a corpse attached to a manacle precisely like the one chained to me. Vermin, similar to rats, gnaw on the carcass, revealing bone, and the aroma of rotting death infiltrates my nose, causing me to gag. Desperate, I huddle as far from the body as I can.

"Evan," I shout, though no one else, except the rats can hear me. Evan and his dad took me and probably brought me here. Wherever here is. I'm guessing the elven realm. That's where they'd been going before I went unconscious. I want to give up. Sob and cry. Throw a temper tantrum. But what's the point?

Instead, I have a thought. One that slithers around like it came from someplace other than my brain. Was it the snakes in the crown? I can still feel the metal diadem attached to my scalp. I touch it, trying to yank it away, but it won't budge.

Determined to control what I can and not what I can't, I carefully shuffle closer to the body, reach out a shaking finger and touch the rat-like creature nearest me. It's chomping down on a finger and pays me no mind. Forcing myself not to vomit, I call forth my powers.

Part of me believed it would be tamped down in this dungeon, but my indigo magic races along my veins and down into my finger. Since my powers are for healing, so I don't know what I expect. Certainly not for the creature to fall onto its back, shudder and writhe before changing into a male pixilette. Burnt orange wings are pressed flat against the hardened dirt. His short hair and clothing are in various shades of orange as well.

As soon as he's whole once again, he stops moving.

"Hey," I whisper harshly, pressing the point of my finger into his stomach. He doesn't respond. Have I killed him? That seems impossible, given the nature of my powers. I poke him again. He still doesn't move.

I'm horrified. What's happened to my powers? I think it might have to do with the crown, but don't know. Tears fill my eyes, and I reach up with my free hand, desperate to tear the crown from my head, scalp and all.

I tear and pull at it, for I don't know how long, but my fingers are sore from the effort, and it won't dislodge. "You've ruined me." I let myself fall back against the wall and turn away, wishing I wasn't so afraid and pleading in my heart that Austin or Christopher or the vampire queen will discover I'm gone and somehow rescue me.

"You're awake." The male voice leaks through the metal bars, though he isn't nearby, but on the stairs a ways off. His words reach my ears as his footfalls shuffle along the corridor.

I don't respond. Sniffle and wipe my nose on the back of my hand.

"There, there, Wysteria. You're alive, which is better than your cellmate. Be grateful for that," he says, his voice getting closer.

I turn then, knowing from all my parents taught me that it's better to face my problems head-on. The elf on the other side of the bars is menacing looking. His hair is black as a moonless sky and long, hanging down to almost his waist. Half of it is pulled back and secured with an elaborate gold pin in the shape of a three-tiered crown. It stands just above the peak of his head. He's wearing a long navy jacket with golden buttons and filigree. His pants are the same color, but he's shirtless, his creamy skin flawless and hairless. But what's the most striking is his face. A jaw so sharp, it looks like it could cut paper with a pointy chin. His lips are a deep red, and his eyes are gray like storm clouds right before a rain.

After several long moments, he smiles. “I am Tharthus, king of the elves.” As he speaks, he clasps his hands behind his back, revealing more of his bare torso. “Welcome to my realm.”

Behind him are several guards. Dressed in colors similar to the king's, but more their armor is more binding, like a soldier’s uniform.

Tharthus waves his head at the lock on the prison bars. One of the guards steps in front of him and unlocks the bolt, then swings open the door before stepping back and out of the king’s way.

Without a word, he steps into the cell. I think he’ll be disgusted by the scent of rotting flesh, but he doesn’t seem to notice, his eyes remaining on me. “Now, let’s see what all the fuss is about.” From his waistband, he pulls out a knife. Immediately, I know it’s the same one Doug, and then Redyrin used. Leaning in, he cuts into my ankle.

I cry out at the pain, still not used to experiencing it.

Tharthus sticks two of his long and pointy fingers into my blood before bringing it to his mouth. I don’t tell him that there is something wrong with my magic. That I killed a pixilette when I tried to heal him. Instead, I watch as his pink tongue flicks out, and he tastes, then smears the rest of my blood against his teeth. Closing his lips, he lifts his head, his eyes rolling back.

A moment later, he looks at me, his eyes flashing with greed. “My idiot brother and his snot-nosed son were right. Your blood is incredible. I feel my body restoring itself already.”

“But the pixilette,” I say, surprised he didn’t have the same reaction the little pixilette did. I glance over and notice he’s no longer lying on his back. He’s gone. Had the pixilette been faking? Was he alive after all?

“Whatever are you blathering about?” Tharthus asks.

“Nothing,” I say and swallow, working to keep my eyes from wandering the cell and beyond for a sign of the sneaky pixilette.

Tharthus stands and straddles himself on either side of me. His crotch is much too close to my face, and I close my eyes. “What are you doing?"

Without a word, he places both hands on the crown and uses all of his might to pull. But the same as me, the blasted thing doesn't budge. He keeps at it for much longer than I did and finally steps back, breathing heavily. "You will never be the queen," he says, spitting the words. Fury has changed his eyes, so they are almost black. "I don't care about your DNA. I don't care who you're related to. You will be nothing but a prisoner for as long as you live." His lips curl in a sly smile. "I'll see you again soon." He turns on his heels and exits the cell.

As the guard locks me in, I hear Tharthus order a guard to remove me to the courtesan's quarters. I've read enough historical romance novels to know where that is, and I'd rather stay down here with the dead.

The guards don't remove me right away. When I am once again alone with the rat creatures, I take the opportunity to touch the rest of them. Each changes into a pixilette. This time they don't play dead. They don't thank me either. Just fly away.

Talk about gratitude.

Still, I'm glad my powers are back to working correctly and think about my parents, anxious to speak with them. The new magic Abernathy awakened shudders to life, and immediately, my parents are here.

"Wysteria." My mom comes forward, her arms stretched to hug me, but her arms go right through. I try to hug her back, but it's no use.

My dad watches her and me with sad eyes. "Are you okay?" he asks, doing his best to hold it together.

"Yes," I say, not wanting them to see how afraid I am.

"I knew Tharthus was an asshole, but to keep you down here and chained up? It's monstrous." My mom is pacing back and forth while dad follows her with his eyes.

Should I tell them I was about to get an upgrade to the courtesan's room? No way. "I just wish I could get out of this," I say, pulling on the manacle attached to the chain hanging from the wall.

"There's got to be something we can do." She glances at my dad.

He takes her shoulders, and she leans against him.

"We've failed her," my mom whispers mournfully.

"No," my dad says.

I say it with him. "Mom, that's not true." Playing the blame game wouldn't do anyone any good.

"I think I might have an idea," my dad says.

Mom and I both look at him.

"We're listening," Mom says, crossing her arms, and she comes to stand beside me. It's then she notices the corpse and makes a face. "The poor dear," she says and moves to stand on the other side.

"Remember the Pegasus unicorn we met a few weeks ago. Envy, I believe, is her name." Dad raises a brow, looking for confirmation from my mom. "She told us she died and was buried by an original vampire," he adds.

"Yes, but what does that have to do with Wysteria?" mom asks, her words filled with frustration.

"Envy said she could live again, but only if someone pure in heart awakens her. With Wysteria's power to heal and the kind of woman she's become if anyone can bring Envy back from the dead, it's our daughter."

As dad speaks, my mom starts bouncing on the balls of her feet. "You're absolutely right." She claps her hands together and spins in a circle. Then she pauses. "But what good will that do our Wys?" Her features fall, and her smile becomes a frown.

"Half of Wysteria's magic comes from unicorns. With Envy's help, I think Wysteria could take back the elven kingdom and rule as the queen." My dad's face is triumphant.

“I appreciate your belief in me, but my top priority is getting out of these chains,” I say softly.

“Yes. Yes. But summon Envy. Do your magical whatever to call for her ghost. I’m certain she can help.” Dad is practically beside himself with certainty, and I appreciate it, but I’m not feeling as confident about my situation as him.

Still, it won’t hurt to try. “Okay, dad. I’ll do it.”

Dad takes mom’s hand. “We have to go.”

Mom looks pained. “I love you. Do as your dad says and summon Envy. And if you need us, call us back.” She grips her hands together as though pleading.

“I will. Love you both.” It seems like every time I summon my parents, their time with me gets shorter and shorter. I’m not sure if it’s a cosmic thing or something else, but if their visit period continues to diminish, I’ll be without them again. That thought rips into my heart as I watch them vanish.

Wiping at a wayward tear, I close my eyes and try to think about a unicorn with wings. In the not too far distance, the sound of someone crying out in pain, like someone is being tortured in another part of the dungeon distracts me. My heart aches for them, but I steel myself. I need to focus. For many seconds I try to imagine a black unicorn with wings, but before anything happens, there’s sounds coming from the hallway leading to my cell.

Several soldiers, including the same one who unlocked my cage the first time appears. He pulls a key from his pocket and there’s a click as the lock releases. His eyes are dark and sinister like he intends to make me his next meal. “Are you going to go the easy way or the hard way?” He comes into the cell but stops just beyond my reach.

I don’t know what the hard way would be, and I don’t want to find out either. “The easy way,” I say quietly.

“Good.” He steps close and releases me from my shackle before helping me stand. His supple fingers circle my entire arm. “Let’s go.”

OceanofPDF.com

PINK ROSES

WYSTERIA

THANKFULLY, he does not put me in more restraints, probably because he knows he can overpower me easily. I walk freely, though I'm between two elven guards. The staircase leading up out of the dungeon is soggy, the walls wet and mossy. When we reach the top, I let out a heavy breath. It's then I realize I've been holding it. As I breathe in again, I catch a whiff of mildew and something else—metal? It's difficult to tell.

From the dungeon, they lead me down a hall. The decor is subtle, including white walls with a delicate garland of pink roses along the top. Silver sconces twinkle, bathing the way with light. The floor is white marble, and the ceiling is too.

My shoes and those of the guards ring loud until we arrive at another set of steps. They curve and twirl sharply up and up and up. The further we go, the sicker my stomach gets. This all feels familiar somehow.

In Redyrin's realm, she kept me in a tall tower. It was more rustic than this, but still. I feel like I'm going back in time instead of forward, and I don't like it. Without preamble, I stop, causing the guard behind me to bump into my backside.

"Hey," he growls. "Get moving." He shoves me, but I hold my ground.

"I won't go another step," I say. What I'm hoping my stubbornness will accomplish is unclear to me, but it doesn't matter.

"The hard way it is then," he says and throws me over his shoulder.

I don't fight. It's useless, but I do search for some bare skin, a place I can use my magic. There isn't an opening. He's completely covered with garb.

When we stop, he's breathing heavily, but I don't care. It should be difficult to imprison me. I hear the first guard unlock a door, and the one holding me whisks me inside and drops me on my butt on the hard wooden floor.

Smarting, I roll onto my knees before rising.

The guards are back at the door, the first one leering. "Tharthus will be in shortly." His eyes rake down my body with a look that says he wants to get to know me better. "Get yourself cleaned up, or I'll be back to do it myself." He licks his lips.

On instinct, I wrap my arms around my body.

He laughs, deep and guttural. "That's what I thought." He closes the door, locking it behind him.

I listen to the echo of their steps as they retreat. Then I sink to the floor and cry. Because it's like the last several months never happened. No rescue or college. No falling in love with Austin. No meeting Sage or taking classes or jungle juice. No freaking freedom. I'm back in a tower. Imprisoned for my magic. For the first time, I wish to be different. Anyone but who and what I am.

"What a waste," I eke out between sobs.

The voices inside my head start up again. They hiss things I don't understand and some that I do.

Your life is exactly as it should be.

Have patience, and all will be revealed.

I do my best to ignore them, but hope still fills my chest. Is it possible good will come of my imprisonment? There is a part of me that doesn't think so. But a spark has been lit. At the same time, I don't want to rule the elven realm. I don't want to be queen. All I want is to return to college and Austin and play the piano duet in the winter gala.

Summon the Pegasus.

Give her a chance.

The voices whispering such things remind me that I promised my parents I would. Her name is Envy. I sit up and wipe my face.

The room is whimsical, with billowing silver drapes hanging from the extra-large window. The walls are made of stone while the furniture is made of wood. It looks hand-carved and decorated with intricate details. There is a door on the same wall as the one the guards brought me through. I crawl over to the nearest piece of furniture, an end table, and heft myself to standing. Then cautiously walk over and twist the fancy robin's egg blue handle. It's the bathroom, and I sigh in relief. Take care of things and then turn on the shower.

The brute of a guard said either I do it or he would, and I shudder at the thought of the elf's hands on my body. That's a hard pass.

When the water is warm, I step in, letting it run against my skin. Immediately, the crown unlatches itself from my head. It slides, and I catch it with both hands, bringing it down so I can look at it. The snakes are there slithering.

Do not set us aside for long, one of them says.

The other hisses in agreement.

Upon closer inspection, the snakes look less like reptiles and more like apparitions. "What are you?" I ask.

Not what but who.

We are known by many names, not that it matters.

The creators of all the realms, including the seven magics.

We created you, dear Rapunzel Wysteria Hart.

For a moment, I debate reminding them of the birds and the bees —about how when a male and female get together. Instead, I just place the crown on the back of the toilet.

Sounds of disgust come from within the metal, and it suddenly vanishes.

I gasp and then sigh with relief that it's gone. “I don’t want it,” I say, holding my head under the water and letting it run down my face for a while. But the guards could return at any time. Or the king. I don’t want to be caught undressed. So I hurry.

When I’m done, I step out and dry myself off. Coil my hair into a thick bun on top of my head. I intend to dress in the same clothes I was wearing, but they have magically disappeared, including my underwear. No question magic is customary here and I’m certain these rooms have been spelled for new arrivals like me, but it’s a bit terrifying.

My old clothes are replaced by new apparel, including a deep navy dress trimmed in silver fur. After putting on the underwear, I stare at the gown. I’m anti killing for the purpose of using fur for clothes. It seems ridiculous, but it’s either the dress or the towel. I offer a silent apology to the animal that died for the stunning garb and slide it on, only slightly curious about where it came from. The fabric is thick and feels like velvet, while the fur makes me want to snuggle. There are socks and matching fur-lined boots as well. I put them on, surprised by how exactly they fit.

As I exit the bathroom, I carefully peer out, hoping the guards haven’t returned, and am relieved to see I’m still alone. Drawn to the window, I make my way over. The pane is thick, and I rest my head against it. Deep snow covers all of the landscape, painting a very white picture. Evergreens hang heavy. Smoke rises from chimneys of little houses in the distance, and beyond them is the ocean. I peer at it closer.

Something about the landscape feels familiar.

I’m not sure why. Not much is the same as the flat land of Wyoming. Still, the feeling won’t go away. Somehow I’ve been here before. As I debate how that’s possible, I feel the wretched crown reattach itself to my head.

“No,” I groan out mournfully, stepping away from the window and throwing myself on the couch. There are a dozen pillows in various shades of blue and gray decorating the seat. I grab the one closest to me and bury my scream in the fluff.

Call forth the ghost of Envy.

Do it now.

I sometimes struggle with doing what I'm told. Maybe it's the rebellious streak that roars through me. Perhaps it's just genetic, but I resist, covering my ears with my hands. Sadly, that doesn't do anything to stifle them, and they repeat themselves.

You must hurry.

Promptly, Wysteria.

I growl out my frustration. "If I do this, will you stop talking to me? I don't like you inside my head?" I speak aloud while staring up at the white-washed ceiling.

Neither of them responds. At least they aren't liars. "Fine."

Closing my eyes, I try to imagine what a black unicorn with wings looks like while repeating Envy's name over and over. Abernathy said the spirit would only come if it wants to. After several minutes without luck, I think Envy isn't interested in helping me. As I'm about to give up, I feel the slight rush of wind as the windows push open. In soars a ghostly apparition of the loveliest unicorn with wings I've ever seen.

"Hello. Hi. Greetings, Wysteria," she says, stomping her foot while tucking her wings at her sides.

All of my irritation forgotten, I rise and move over to the creature. "You're Envy?" I verify.

She whinnies softly and lowers her head as though she wants me to pet her nose.

I try, but it's no use. My hand goes right through her head.

"Correct. Right. Yes," she says. "And you're Wysteria. The rightful queen of the elven realm." Her violet eyes take in my crown.

I grimace. “That’s what I’ve heard,” I say, crossing my arms.

“You don’t want to be?” she asks, stepping closer, invading my space without actually touching me.

“No,” I admit softly.

She whinnies again. “Lower your head. I want to show you something.”

“Okay?” I’m confused, but duck to make sure my head will pass through her horn. The shart tip pricks against my forehead, and I’m no longer in the courtesan’s rooms but running through a forest.

Fear eats at my insides, and I glance back. Those chasing me are gaining, and I push myself harder. When I reach the glade, I stop. Dozens of unicorns in various shades of white exit, and I am surrounded.

“Our youngest sibling. Black as the night.”

“Despicable.”

“Let’s destroy her.”

They move closer and closer, and I realize I’m not me any longer but am inside Envy’s mind. Seeing her past and living her life.

From behind, someone kicks Envy, shoving her to the ground. And then she's being kicked and stabbed by all of them until she should be dead. For a long time, they take out their anger on Envy's body. When they finish, they stomp and neigh, speaking all manner of horrible things before walking away, leaving Envy to suffer alone.

That moment passes, and I’m walking in a forest with a man—an elven man. He has wise eyes, though they are kind when they look upon me and Envy.

“You are healing nicely? How is the pain where they removed your horn?”

“My king. Devoran. Sire, that is right,” Envy responds. “The wounds are gone. There is only a little pain.”

It breaks my heart that they ripped away her horn. That is where unicorns hold their power or most of it.

“Good,” he says. The man Envy walks with is the old elven king. My ancestor. “And how are you healing emotionally?”

Envy shakes her—I shake my mane. “I wish to say I am better. You’ve done so much for me. But my emotional injuries are abysmal, cavernous, profound.”

Devoran reaches out and touches the side of Envy’s neck, petting her slowly. “Take all the time you need. It’s difficult to be special. Unique. But it’s that difference, that uniqueness that will save the world and not just once but multiple times, you mark my words.”

We look up at the king, wondering what he means, though Envy doesn’t ask.

“I can see you aren’t sure, but you will know when the time is right,” the king adds.

The scene changes again. Envy is near a waterfall. “You need the healing power of a unicorn horn, don’t you?” Envy asks a strange creature with the most painfully beautiful face, her body is covered in fur like an ape, and she has glorious wings. It’s then I remember a long-forgotten story my mom told of the original vampires, Silindra and Sharra. This being is an original, I can tell.

“Your horn isn’t fully grown. I couldn’t ask that of you,” the original says.

“Silindra, it’s my destiny, my fate, my calling, to do this,” Envy replies, her voice strong and confident.

Before I can get my bearings, the scene shifts again. We are in the midst of what looks like a war. Trolls and elves, and other supernatural creatures are slaughtering each other. Pain radiates from several wounds in Envy’s body. She is lying on her side struggling for breath.

Silindra is there. Concern evident on her lovely face. She uses magic, and a forcefield surrounds us.

“Come closer, Silindra,” Envy says.

The original gets on both knees, leaning her face next to Envy’s. “I’m here, Envy.” A faint scent of lilacs surrounds us, and I know it’s Envy’s magic leaking from her body and into the earth beneath us.

Envy takes a deep breath. A black swirling mist surrounded us, and I sense great inner strength radiating from the unicorn’s body.

When the mist vanishes, Envy’s body is still broken—except for her horn. It spiraled up to a point, fully-grown and beautiful, swirled with silver and indigo. And I’m surprised I can see it, but at once realize it matches my crown exactly.

“Envy, your horn. It’s stunning,” Silindra says.

“It’s my gift, present…” Envy coughs, and blood dribbles from her mouth. I feel her life sucked from her body, and I begin to shake. Then Envy’s spirit lifts and hovers above her body.

With the forcefield still around us, Silindra digs a deep hole and carefully lays Envy’s body within before burying her. “I’m sorry, Envy, but I’ll make sure your sacrifice wasn’t for nothing.” With more magic, Silindra covers the grave with lilacs. Tears drip from Silindra’s eyes as she cries out her grief over Envy’s passing.

“Let this part of the land never be free of lilacs,” Silindra says. With those words came hundreds of beautiful lilacs. “Nothing save true love can ever disturb this resting place, Envy, for you are truly the greatest of all the unicorns.”

With sadness in mine and Envy’s heart, the unicorn leans back, separating my mind from hers. We are back in the present. “I saw you die,” I say, tears filling my eyes.

“Yes, and now you see where my body is buried, submerged, hidden.”

Her words confuse me. “Yes, but what am I supposed to do?” My parents believed she could help but I figured they meant her ghost.

“Find my body. When Snow White separated the realms, my body came into the elven realm. All you have to do is locate a field of lilacs."

I appreciate that knowledge, but I'm still confused. "Silindra said you could only be awakened by true love." I care for the unicorn, but it isn't true love.

"Your love for Austin is true, correct? Right? Accurate?"

I swallow at his name because I miss him ferociously. "Yes," I reply, my voice hoarse with emotion.

She nickers, nodding her head happily. "Find me, and I can help you take back the elven realm."

"Okay," I say, though I'm not convinced. Because first, I need to get out of this damn tower.

Envy begins to fade. "And Wysteria? If you think this realm is familiar, that's because it is. Redyrin kept you captive here in an unknown part of the realm."

I start at her words. "How do you know?"

Her wings extend, and she flaps them slowly. "Redyrin told me."

"You spoke with her?" That doesn't seem like a good thing. Was Envy working with Redyrin? If I resurrected the unicorn, would Redyrin somehow return as well?

"She sought me out and asked me to help you, as well." Envy shakes her mane. "Death has a way of clearing up inadequacies within us. Redyrin died with good in her. She is working to make amends. Don't lose hope. I'm closer than you think." Envy is nearly gone, but she's still speaking. "Close your eyes and imagine yourself in a field of lilacs. Let the power in the crown, as well as your own, take you there."

I'm too stunned to respond. The unicorn spoke with Redyrin. Had my parents as well? Before I can ask, Envy is gone. Without hesitating, I decided to take my destiny into my own hands. I want out of this tower, and I'm desperate to find Austin.

I throw myself back on the couch. Close my eyes. In my mind, I think about a field full of lilacs, searching for where Silindra buried Envy. The crown flares to life. I feel its heat against my head, but I don't stop.

And suddenly, I'm standing in a field full of lilacs. All around the landscape is mounds of deep snow, but the cold of winter hasn't affected Envy's meadow. It's strangely beautiful. Magical, I think.

I glance down at myself, surprised, and see that it isn't my body that's here, but my spirit. Trying not to be freaked out, I float around the landscape in my ghostly form until I come across an area where the lilacs are the thickest. Kneeling, I place my hands on the grassy mound, thinking I have no idea what to do next.

"Envy," I whisper. As I expected, nothing happens, but there is a light breeze that stirs the hairs on my neck. Again, I say her name. "Envy, in the name of true love, I call you forth. Rise from the grave." I pause, thinking I sound stupid. "Please," I add.

Immediately, the ground begins to shake and rumble. I fall back as the mound is peeled back, and Envy flies out of the grave. She drops in front of me, waving her head and flapping her wings. For a moment, I think she'll stomp me to death, and then I remember I'm not actually here. My spirit snaps back to my body like a rubber band, and I open my eyes.

There is a noise coming from the other side of my rooms. Someone or several someone's are on the stairs. They'll reach my prison soon.

Rushing to the window, I push the glass open. In the distance, I see a dark spot. "Hurry," I plead. The voices are closer. Someone jiggles the handle. In a last-ditch effort, I use my might to push the couch in front of the door. But the guards get the lock undone and are forcing their way in.

I turn back in time to see Envy and rush to the window, stepping up on the sill. "They're coming," I shout.

There's a grunt, and the couch is out of the way. Envy is still a ways away, but there isn’t time.

“Don’t you dare,” the guard shouts.

But I do. And I step off the sill just as the guard reaches out for me. As I fall, the hem of my dress tears, but I don't care because I'm free.

Envy dives and swoops underneath me, catching me just before I hit the ground. “That was close,” she says and shakes her mane, laughing. “But, wow, it feels good to be alive.”

With the wind in my hair and the menacing guards at my back, I laugh with her. “Yes, it does.”

OceanofPDF.com

UNABLE TO FIGHT

AUSTIN

I'M NOT one to imagine ways to die. There was never a point, not since Christopher changed me into a vampire. Between vampirism and my elven blood, I have the privilege of living eternally. But when my uncle Linroe shoves a hot blade in my eye for the fifth time in as many minutes, I can't help wondering if death is a possibility.

Christopher moans beside me. The giant hook poking out of his chest is dark red, almost black from dried blood. Somehow the wound won't close around the metal, and blood still leaks from it and down his clothes and boots in a steady stream onto the dirt floor beneath him.

A pool of blood has formed and has nearly reached mine.

There's a blade sticking out of one of Christopher's eyes too. Evan left it there after stabbing him multiple times.

I want to tell my surrogate vampire father that everything will be okay, but I don't want to lie. Because I don't know that it will. I'm still in shock that we are imprisoned like this. Before we left Sharra, we hoped to rescue Wysteria and help her take back the realm. But a week ago, as soon as we crossed through, we were captured and brought down into this hell-hole. It's dank and smells of dirty seawater and rotting fish.

The guards used magic on us, making it, so we were unable to fight or move. They hung us like meat from the ceiling, skewering us back to front and through the sternum with oversized fishing hooks, like those used for catching tuna. The needle has a barb on the backside, so if I try to pull myself off, it digs into my skin, causing pain, the likes of which I don't understand. All of the metal is soaked in potent spells I can smell and created to keep vampires from escaping. They knew we were coming, thanks to my horrible uncle Linroe and my cousin, Evan. It hurts nearly as much as the hook through my chest that they betrayed me. If I live through this and see either of them again, I'll tear out their throats without thinking twice about it.

Linroe yanks the blade from my eye and wipes it on a dirty cloth. "Even as a child, you were a difficult boy. That's why your dad had to beat you so often. He needed to whip some sense into you."

"Is that right?" I eke out. My voice doesn't sound like my own, probably because of the pain thrumming from every inch of my body. It's like the magic on the metal has leaked into my veins. Usually, my wounds immediately heal, but whatever spell is on the blade keeps the gash from closing.

"Now then, are you ready to listen, nephew?" Linroe shoves the knife-edge back in the fire burning brightly to our right.

"Que? No hablo asshole," I say and laugh, though it quickly turns to a cough.

Evan kicks me in the stomach, sending me spinning around like a top of a child's plaything before I smack into Chris. "Stop being a dick. You can still come out of this intact. All you have to do is be willing to serve us." He chuckles harshly and spits in my face.

Christopher moans but doesn't say anything. He's worse off than I am, and I'm worried.

"Austin, hang in there," Leva says.

"Quiet, vermin," Evan snaps, walking over to the birdcage holding the pixilette. He slams his hand against the cage so hard, I think it will break, but it holds steady.

With my one good eye, I glance in the pixilette's direction. I forgot she was down here with us. Her prison looks like a birdcage, but I know the enclosure is made up of more than just sticks. Otherwise, Leva would be free already. Something is happening to her body, as well. Her hands and feet are replaced with what looks like small, hairy paws.

Someone who is light on their feet glides down steps and heads into the corridor outside the room before reaching us.

“How’s it going?” a man asks. His voice is light and airy, and something else. I hear anger just under the surface.

“Great, brother,” Linroe says. “We will have Austin on our side soon.”

“Lies,” I hiss.

Evan returns and slams his fist into my nose. Blood spurts everywhere, and I see red, but only briefly. He didn't wound me with magic, and my fractured nose begins to heal immediately. “Shut it, cuz!”

The king, his name is Tharthus, comes into view. “You coming over to our way of thinking, son?” There’s a gleam in his eyes I don’t like. The elven king isn’t someone to be trifled with. When I don’t respond, he goes on, “I didn’t think so.” Tharthus walks over to the blade, heating in the fire. Picks it up. It’s red-hot again, and I cringe.

“Don’t worry, Tharthus, we’ll break him,” Linroe says, walking over to his brother, arrogance lifting his nose and chin.

“I think not,” Tharthus says and shoves the full length of the sword directly into Linroe’s stomach.

I gasp at the brutality.

Evan, who’s still standing near me, doesn’t move. “The fu—?” All the color drains from his face. He’s in shock, not that I blame him. “Dad,” he ekes out, stepping toward dad.

Linroe turns to look at his son. “Help me,” he says, raising a hand as she falls to his knees. Blood soaks his shirt.

“Don’t move,” someone says. I didn’t hear this additional person come down, but I watch the elven guard clamp manacles on Evan’s wrists.

While that’s happening, Tharthus steps back and slices the blade across my uncle's neck.

That's when Evan reacts. "No," he screams, shaking himself from the elf's hold and falling to the ground beside his dad.

Tharthus leers at Evan with a smile that is as evil as him. "You did your part," he taunts. "You served your king. But did you really think I would let either of you live?" Evan tries to stand, but Tharthus pushes him back to his knees.

"We brought you Wysteria," Evan begins. "You said—"

My cousin doesn't get the chance to finish.

Tharthus sends the blade across Evan's neck.

I cringe, closing my eyes against the trauma for the briefest moment. Evan's eyes get wide, and his mouth is in a permanent O as his head slides from his body. Alive, I couldn't stand either of them, and I'd even had murderous thoughts about them. But seeing them dead is painful. They are—were the last of my family. I shudder at the sight of Evan's Body crumbling into a heap on top of his father. There isn't anger, nor grief, but fear. Somehow, I must live so I can save Wysteria.

Tharthus turns to me, placing the tip of the sword at my throat. "Now, then. You'll hang around, won't you?" The murderous asshole is trying to be funny since I am hanging by my ribs to an enormous magical hook. I want to snap his neck. For now, I don't reply.

"It doesn't matter," Tharthus says, pushing the blade deeper into my neck. The sharp edge cuts my skin. "The only reason you won't die yet is that I have plans for you."

"I won't help you," I say viciously. "Besides, I have nothing to offer."

"Well, that's not true. You're a half-elf and all vampire. An excellent and deadly combination—a supernatural hybrid."

Sickness winds through my belly as I try to imagine where he could be going with his line of conversation. "So?"

“So,” Tharthus begins before moving over to the fire and shoving the blade into the flames. “I can work with that. See, I want to rule over all the realms. Snow White is weak. She thinks humans deserve to live in harmony with supernaturals, but that’s unrealistic. We are the superior species. Humans were created to serve us like donkeys, not to be coddled and bargained with.”

“It’s good to have goals,” I say and roll my eyes.

“Snow White is the most amazing queen who ever lived,” Leva shouts, her little voice cutting through the silence.

Tharthus laughs. “My dear little one, you’re wrong.” He glances at the pixilette before moving over to Christopher. “And you?” He shoves Christopher, making my surrogate father swing back and forth lightly.

Christopher moans. “Tharthus, let me go,” he says softly.

“Oh, I will release you once your blood is completely drained.” He smiles, and a jolt of fear shoots through me. Tharthus isn’t going to kill Christopher, but he intends to make him suffer for eternity. That’s worse than dying. “By the looks of it, you're nearly dry. All of your disgusting vampire blood is in the dirt.” He kicks at the puddle beneath Christopher, splashing it with the tip of his boot. “Instruct the others to bring in the chest.”

“Yes, sire.” The guard jogs away and shouts that the king is ready before returning.

Four soldiers appear with little grunting or effort, carrying not a chest like what I was expecting, but a casket. It looks to be made of metal. There’s a grate at the top big enough to see through. “No,” I whisper severely as comprehension washes over me.

“You’re smart, that’s good,” Tharthus says as the guards set down the casket to the right of Christopher.

“You can’t bury him alive.” The idea of being buried deep in the earth sends convulsions through me.

Christopher glances at me, a look I can’t understand on his face. It’s like he’s accepting his fate. Like he’s okay with it.

“Chris?”

“Don’t worry about me,” he responds.

“Listen to the Hunter. After everything he’s done, he knows this is better than what he deserves.” All four guards work together to remove Christopher from the hook and place him in the casket on his back. My vampire friend looks withered and frail, like an old man. I watch as the guards put the lid on and lock it shut.

“Stop. I’ll do anything,” I say. I can’t help it. Seeing Christopher sealed inside the casket sends me spiraling inside. I lost my mom and dad. My uncle and cousin. Wysteria. I can’t lose him.

“Good,” Tharthus says, then turns to me. “After a decade, if you’ve created enough vampires-elven hybrids, I’ll think about searching the bottom of the ocean floor to find him.”

“What? No!” The prospect of spending even a day at the bottom of the ocean terrifies me.

“You thought I was going to bury him in the ground, but you thought wrong. I’m going to throw his desiccated carcass into the sea.”

“Chris!” I shout, even though there is no point. I’m trussed up and can’t move.

The king smiles. Anger burns within as he waves a hand at the casket. “Take him away.”

The guards heft Christopher and carry him from the room.

Leva is crying. I can hear her from her cage but don’t acknowledge her. I’m afraid Tharthus will hurt her if I do. Beyond her, my vampire hearing picks up something else, something that can’t be right. It sounds like Wysteria, but she’s laughing.

“Bring in the girl,” Tharthus commands, his gaze on someone behind me that I can’t see.

The soft scent of rose water fills my nose, as does the smell of innocent blood. A guard shoves a lovely young elven woman into my view. I'm ashamed to admit that my fangs press against the insides of my mouth. As much blood as I've lost, the woman smells like life. Thoughts of draining her while watching the life leave her eyes as her warm blood fills my mouth and coats throat rush across my mind. I shudder and strain against my restraints, ignoring the pain.

Tharthus watches me and chuckles deeply. "You can have her, boy. I know Snow gave you the Hunter's gift. Drink and fulfill your duty to me, your only kin. Create hybrids for me, and you can live in luxury at my side.

Tears fill the elven woman's eyes. If anything, her fear makes her more desirable.

Tharthus nods, and the guard carefully pushes the girl close.

At that moment, there is nothing except for my need. I grab her by the arms and sink my teeth into her flesh.

OceanofPDF.com

LOWER ME

CHRISTOPHER

I'M BARELY conscious as the guards heft my casket up the steps. At some point, I pass out, my dreams fraught with all of my sins. When I come to, I can hear sea birds calling and the push and pull of the waves on the shore.

"Did the king tell you how far we are taking him out?"

"No, but Tharthus isn't a forgiving man. Better settle in. We could be gone for days."

"Ahoy, can we come aboard?" one of them calls.

"State yer business."

"We have the prisoner, fool," another guard says.

"Very well. Careful on the plank."

Their boots clomp up. I hear the wood creak and feel it sway as the guards carefully make their way onto what I'm guessing is a ship. After more jostling, they lower me onto the deck.

"Don't leave it there. Get him below."

"Yes, captain."

I'm lifted again.

"How do we get this down those stairs," one of them asks.

"Easy."

And I feel myself falling briefly before the casket crashes onto the floor.

"Watch it, you damn fool. Want the boat to spring a leak?"

"No, sir."

"If we do, it's your ass that'll keep it stopped. Understand?"

"Yes, sir."

My metal home is standing on its end, the way it landed when the idiot guards dropped me. There isn't much to see, especially not with my limited view. A pile of rope, dark wood that makes up the ship, and barrels of what I'm guessing is wine. Vermin skitter about, but their blood smells tainted. Still, I'll take any kind I can get.

Within minutes, a few of the rat-like creatures scratch at the base of my casket, but their nails won't allow them to climb up the smooth surface. "Keep trying," I whisper. If one gets close enough, I won't like it, but I'll drain its blood to restore my strength.

Above, I hear the crew getting ready to cast away. Before long, the ship makes its way out of the port, and it sails out to what I'm guessing is someplace where no one can find me. The idea of spending even a day in the ocean fills me with dread, but if I'm still alive, then there is still hope. I cling to that as the day turns to the night, followed by another day and a night.

A storm whips the ship around like a rubber duckling floating in a child's bathtub. It's nearly dawn, though the dark sky doesn't reveal much sunlight. Salty seawater rages in through the round windows causing the barrels to fall over. My casket does too, and I'm facedown. Above, I hear the men shouting. It doesn't sound good, and then there's a loud crack. The boards on one side of the ship shatter, and water rushes at me until I'm buried and floating.

It's a strange sensation, feeling the weight push me down as water gets into my lungs, drowning me again and again though it doesn't bother me.

After some time, either hours or seconds, I don't know. Time stands still in the deep. Something large bumps against my casket, and then I see an eye so large it fills the window of my metal prison.

I'm past feeling fear or worry. There is only conscious and unconscious. My life is out of my hands. Whatever my fate, I'm consigned to it and close my eyes.

I'M BEING JOSTLED, carried, I think. My watery grave is ascending, and my first thought is that it's already been a decade. Austin must have given in to Tharthus, not that I blame him. If the roles were reversed, I seriously doubt I would've continued to resist. My hope is if Austin has allowed the king to sway him, that he will listen to me, and I can talk sense into him.

But first, I need blood. I'm so hungry. The need is beyond anything I've ever felt. My insides are eating themselves, and if I had strength, I might try to suck blood from myself, not that it would do any good.

While I continue to ascend, I can't help thinking about Snow White's blood and Jasmine's too. Plus, the women whose blood flowed so freely just before Wysteria returned. More than that, I think of Sharra and the way I betrayed Snow White. All of my sins weigh heavily, and I wonder if Tharthus wasn't right when he said I got what I deserved. Despite the good, I've tried to do since. Can good outweigh the bad? That's a question I don't know the answer to and probably never will.

The casket bobs out of the water, and I'm being dragged, then pulled. The sound of huffing and puffing and scraping as my prison is drawn from the sea. The sun beats brightly down, burning my skin, and I wonder if Tharthus has created this as a new form of torture.

Suddenly the sun is blocked by a vision. Her skin is sun-kissed with long dark hair that she twists to one side. "You poor dear," she says, her voice like a song as she peers at me. Then she's gone, and my heart yearns for her return. Until I hear the snap of the locks, and she hefts the lid off. "Who did this to you?" she asks, clucking her tongue in distaste, probably because I don't smell right.

I can't speak as thirst overwhelms me. As beautiful as she is, all I can focus on is the thrumming of her heart. "Come closer," I say, but the words come out garbled. I try to use my compulsion though I sense I'm too weak for it to work.

Still, she kneels beside me and leans in so that her face is directly above mine. “I’m Ellora.”

Again, I try to speak, but it’s like sand has taken up permanent residence in my throat.

“You’re a vampire?” Her gorgeous green eyes widen, not in fear but with interest. “I’ve never met a vampire before.” She bats her lashes inquisitively.

I want to ask her how she knows what I am. My guess is it’s the color of my skin or maybe because my eyes are red. “Thirsty,” I say, desperate for the warmth of her blood in my mouth.

“You want my blood?” She glances at her hands. Sunlight surrounds them, giving her fingers an unearthly glow. “Very well,” she says and places her wrist on my mouth.

With all the effort I can muster, I bite into her skin.

She lets out a small gasp but doesn’t move away.

Blood slowly flows into my mouth. With each swallow, I feel better and better until I’m able to grab hold of her hand with both of mine, pressing her wrist further into my mouth. She doesn’t know what she’s done. By offering herself as a sacrifice, I’ll live, but I don’t know whether I have the strength to let her live.

“It’s okay,” she says. “Take as much as you like.”

I’m surprised by her kindness, and that’s all it takes to retract my fangs and release her.

“You look much better already. Handsome even,” she says with a smile. “What’s your name?”

I sit up, noticing that she’s completely naked and gloriously breathtaking. “Christopher,” I reply, thinking I've waited my whole life for her.

OceanofPDF.com

SLIGHT GROAN

AUSTIN

I STARE into the eyes of my would-be prey and flash my fangs. The elven woman closes her eyes but doesn't shriek or pull away, even though she could. I'm weak.

"Go on then, boy. Have your fill. Just don't kill her." Tharthus laughs darkly.

I want to drink from her. I'm desperate for her blood. As I pull her shoulder to my mouth, I convince myself that I'll just take enough to get strong. Then I can defeat the king. I close my eyes against what I'm going to do. Go against everything I've been taught. Everything I believe about my species. I'm not a monster, but I'm so thirsty.

"Hurry up. I've already got another dozen waiting for their turn. Once you've created my army, we'll go against Snow White, defeat her, and I'll rule all of the realms with you by my side."

His crazy talk is all it takes for me to decide I can't go through with drinking from her, no matter how badly I need it. I shove her away, though my strength is sapped, and she barely moves. But I glance up at Tharthus, resolve in my veins. "I won't help you," I say.

He removes the blade from the fire and shoves it into my gut. Pain burns through me, and I bite down on the inside of my cheek, drawing what little blood I have left into my mouth. When the hilt of the sword touches my skin, I let out a slight groan. "I don't care what you do to me. I won't do what you want."

Tharthus yanks out the blade and throws it to the ground. "I see that you are speaking the truth. You're stronger than I thought, but you will obey me." He kicks the elven woman in the stomach, and she cries out, scuttling away from him. "Bring me Wysteria. Perhaps after Austin watches me torture the woman he loves, he'll change his mind."

At Wysteria's name, I cringe.

"That's what I thought." Tharthus laughs again. "Get her now," he shouts.

Boots smack down the hall and up the stairs. I keep track of him, using my vampire abilities. He climbs and climbs until I think he can't go any further. When he reaches his destination, I hear the slightest gasp. "She's gone."

Relief fills my guts, and I close my eyes. If Wysteria escaped, then I can die a happy man. Instead of returning to my cell, the guard takes off in the opposite direction. He doesn't want to tell the king what's happened, and I don't blame him.

Tharthus waits impatiently a few moments before going over to the elven woman. She presses against the wall when she sees him coming for her. "There, there, young one," he says, brushing some hair off her face. "You want to serve your king in any way I ask, don't you?"

Her eyes are bright with fear. "Yes, your highness."

"That's what I thought." He pushes her dress up and pushes her knees apart as he positions himself between them.

"Stop it," I shout. I cannot allow him to force himself on someone right in front of me. I don't care who he is or that I don't know the woman. No one deserves to be treated in such a way.

Tharthus glances back, his features dark and hungry with lust. "If you won't change her, then she is useless to me, except for pleasure." He tilts his head to one side. "Unless you've changed your mind?"

"Shouldn't I start with you?" I ask. "If you want to rule all of the supernaturals, shouldn't you become a hybrid first?"

Tharthus rolls his eyes. "Nice try, nephew. I don't trust you now. But once you've changed enough that I have plenty of hybrids loyal to me, I'll have you change me then." His eyes flash in anger. "Now, are you going to do as I command or not?" His gaze falls on the elven woman still cowering near him.

"Very well," I say and swallow down what feels like sharp razors that have found their way into my throat.

Tharthus tucks in his shirt. "You are a soft-hearted sap, aren't you?" He stands, taking her by the arm and dragging her back over. "Now then, don't waste my time. Change her now."

Changing any creature, supernatural or not, into a vampire is against the law. When Christopher changed me, I became unsanctioned. And I wonder how the vampire queen knew I was changed. Whether some part of her vampire magic allows her to see when a creature has become like her. If that's the case, maybe she'll send help. I take the woman by the shoulders. "Tilt your head," I order.

She does as I command, and I sink my teeth into her pulsing vein. Blood fills my mouth, and for several seconds I am lost. There is nothing except her blood as I drink and drink until I feel nearly whole. I can also feel the twisted magic on the hook still piercing through my sternum. That part of my body won't heal.

Since I have the Hunter's magic, changing someone into a vampire is easy. But it's also strange. As her blood flows into me, so do her memories, including her likes and loves, her secrets and desires. It's like she becomes a part of me. Did this happen with Christopher when he changed me? I know the answer is yes. With the elf, I now know her name is Gida. Though her blood and body are innocent, her mind is full of hate for the king. Tharthus killed her family, making her witness his wickedness. As I watch her little brother and sister beheaded and her mom and dad drawn and quartered, my hatred for my uncle builds too.

Gida, I shout into her mind.

She shudders. I-I can hear you.

Do you feel the change happening?

Yes, she says slowly.

When the transformation is complete, you must kill the king, I say.

She shudders again and doesn't respond right away. Finally, I feel her sigh internally. Done.

In the king's arrogance, he's put himself in a very vulnerable position. Gida will be stronger, faster, and more powerful than him.

On top of that, my strength grows as well.

When her change is finished, I stop drinking, but keep my fangs inserted into her vein. Are you ready? I ask into her mind.

Without responding, she takes off. In an instant, Gida has the king kneeling before her, his neck twisted at an odd angle.

His eyes are bugging out of his head, but he doesn't speak. My uncle is pissed. "What do you think you're doing? You serve me. Release me now, and I'll consider letting you live."

I shake my head, and with all the newfound blood in me, lift up on the chain and push myself off the hook. It hurts, and I groan but don't stop until I'm free.

Tharthus and Gida look at me.

I glance down at the hole in my torso just below the ribs, waiting for it to heal. It doesn't. And Gida's blood gushes out of me like a bloody thunderstorm. I fall to my knees, pressing my hands to the hole.

Gida looks nervous.

I swallow. "It's okay. Do what must be done."

She nods and uses her new strength to clamp down harder on the king's head, but she can't go through with it.

"You're weak," Tharthus shouts, trying to escape her grasp.

At the same moment, there is stomping or clomping of hooves on the steps. It doesn't sound like guards, but a horse, which is strange. "Hurry," I shout, trying to stand. If I can get the door closed, maybe I can keep whoever is coming out until the king is no longer a threat. I lift one leg and put my weight on it, but fall forward. “Kill him, Gida!” My strength, my life force, is literally rushing out of my body. It’s the magic in the spell. It’s then I realize there is no cure for me. My uncle, King Tharthus, never intended to let me live—at least not at his side like he said. It was just another damn lie.

OceanofPDF.com

WITH PLEASURE

WYSTERIA

As Envy and I search the elven realm for a way to escape, three pixilettes come into view. They carry something strange between them. When they see Envy and me, I wave. One of the pixilettes lets go and flies over.

"You're the one they call Wysteria." The male pixilette, dressed in all green, speaks as though he knows me.

I tilt my head to one side, trying to place him. "Yes, I'm Wysteria. And who are you?"

He bows briefly. "Houda," he says. "Will you help us save our friend? She's been spelled, and the magic is changing her into a vermin, the way I was." He pauses and points back at the others. "The way we all were before you saved us."

That's how I know him. He pretended to be dead until I turned my back on him. "I'd be glad too." I pat the side of Envy's soft neck. "Can you find us a safe place to land?"

"Certainly. Happily. With pleasure," Envy responds.

It's cute that she says the same thing three different ways when she responds. "Thank you, Envy."

"Hang on." She tilts us downward.

I wrap my arms around her neck as she aims us toward a particular spot where the snowy-covered forest butts up against the sandy beach. It's like two different seasons in one picturesque location.

"It's because of Tharthus," Envy explains. "The realm is rebelling against his rule over the land. That's why it's winter in the forest and over most of the land. Once the frigid cold reaches everywhere, life will slowly die off, and the elves will have no choice but to abandon their realm for another.

I think about humans and supernaturals in my realm. It's a delicate balance that sometimes doesn't feel balanced at all. "How do you know all of this?" I ask her as she lands on the beach, her hooves sinking slightly into the sand.

"Devoran and I have been keeping tabs since Tharthus killed him and took control. The realm won't last much longer."

As she speaks, I feel the cold slowly advancing onto the beach. "I wonder," I say and touch my hand to the invisible barrier between the cold and the hot air. Then I call forth my power, allowing my magic to work.

At my magic, the cold recedes. At the same time, the voices in my crown begin to whisper.

You must take your place first.

The realm's control is too strong.

First, you must dethrone Tharthus.

The pretend king must go.

"I understand," I say softly and withdraw my power back into myself.

"What?" Envy asks.

"Nothing," I respond as I climb off her back.

The three pixilettes bring the one suffering from the enchantment and carefully lay her in my hands. As soon as I see her pallid face, I gasp. "Leva!"

"You know her?" Houda is surprised.

"Yes," I say, and while cupping Leva in my hands, I send forth my healing magic. It covers her in indigo light until I can't see her any longer.

As the three pixilettes watch, the one whose name is Houda speaks. "She was being held in another part of Tharthus's dungeon with a hybrid called Austin and the vampire known as Christopher."

"Austin is here?" My heart pounds against my ribs. "Is he alive?"

The pixilettes face turns sour. “Last I saw, he was drinking the blood of some elven woman.”

“That doesn’t sound like my Austin.”

The pixilette shrugs. “I don’t think he had a choice. Tharthus wants him to change all elves loyal to him into vampire hybrids so he can take over all the realms.” He clucks his tongue in disgust. “Why is it always the narcissists who wind up in positions of power?”

“Good question,” I say, my eyes flicking back to my friend as my magic slowly diminishes back into my hands. When it’s gone, Leva is whole once again. “Leva,” I whisper. “Are you okay?”

Her lashes flutter against her tiny cheeks before she opens her eyes. “Wys?” She coughs, expelling the last of whatever enchantment was shifting her.

I can’t help the laugh of joy that escapes. “That’s right. I’m here.”

She sits up, her hair, wings, and clothes changing to blue—the same dark color as my magic. “Thank you,” she says, standing. “My thoughts were getting all wobbly.” She sticks out her tongue. “I was craving dead bodies,” she says and gags.

Leva only eats fruits and vegetables, so I can understand why she’s repulsed. “But you’re back to yourself now?”

“Yes.” She gives me a broad smile. “I feel great.”

I’m relieved, but now my thoughts turn to Austin. “What is Tharthus doing to him and Christopher?”

Leva lifts into the air, testing out her wings.

Envy comes to stand beside me, and the pixilette clasps her hands together in glee. “You’re astonishing,” she says, my question forgotten.

Envy whinnies happily. “Thank you, Leva. So are you.”

My pixilette best friend flies over to Envy’s glorious horn and touches it. “It’s warm, and I feel your power flowing through it.” Her voice is awed.

Though I'm worried about Austin, I can't help but smile. "She really is the best, isn't she?" I rub my hand along her side.

"You're making me blush," Envy says, but I hear the happiness in her voice.

"Will you rule the elven realm?" Houda asks, sucking all of the light-heartedness from my heart.

I face him, knowing the time for cheeriness is gone. "Yes, Houda, I will."

He bows, and the other two pixilettes whose names I don't know bow with him. "Very well. We will seek out those loyal to Devoran and the rightful heir."

"Thank you," I say. "And I will do everything in my power to stop Tharthus."

"You are the true queen." Houda claps a hand over his heart before flying away.

I watch as the other two fly after him. Then to Leva, I say, "Take me to Austin and Christopher." I hop onto Envy's back.

Envy nickers, extending her wings and flapping them a few times as though she's checking that they still work.

Leva clasps her hands together. "Christopher—" She doesn't finish.

"It's okay," I say. "Just take me to Austin." Urgency eats at my insides. Even though Houda said Austin was drinking from an elven woman, I don't care. As long as he is alive, we can work through everything else.

At least that's what I tell myself.

Envy lifts into the air.

It doesn't take long for us to reach the castle. At the back entrance, I slide off Envy before she touches down.

"Where do you think you're going?" Envy huffs.

"I didn't think you'd want to go down into the dungeon," I say, my eyes taking in her beautiful ebony wings. Her body was buried in the earth for many, many long years. To go down, beneath the ground once again, I shudder for her.

“Nonsense,” Envy says, her voice strong and determined. “Where you go, I go.”

“Envy is right,” Leva says, crossing her arms.

“Very well, then lead the way.” I am in awe of their courage, and even though my insides quiver with the idea of facing Tharthus, I will be brave because of my friends.

We descend the stairs together. I keep thinking there should be guards coming after me—after us, but it’s quiet. Our footfalls echo and bounce around us.

“How much further?” I ask, biting down on my lip.

I reach the bottom step, and we are moving down a narrow corridor, the walls slick with moisture and moss. Envy is behind me.

“Not much farther,” Leva responds, her voice so quiet, and I barely hear her.

Sounds are coming from the room at the end of the hall. It’s Austin, and I take off, running past Leva, my fears replaced by my desperation to see him. It feels like forever, even though it’s only been a few weeks.

When I enter the room, I’m not prepared for what I see. An elven woman has Tharthus on his knees while Austin tries to convince her to kill the king.

Her scared eyes flick to mine.

Austin’s do too.

Tharthus uses my distraction and jumps up, hitting the woman in the face before rushing toward me.

Then Envy enters, blocking his escape, and he skids to a stop. “Let me leave this place,” he demands. His eyes are wild. He knows he has nowhere to go.

“You will not be leaving here as king of the elves,” Austin says. He takes me in, and his features soften, but only briefly. “The king must die.”

“I’m your kin. Would you kill your blood?” Tharthus’s shoulders sag as he steps toward Austin and then pauses.

“I saw first-hand the way you treat your own blood. Uncle Linroe and Evan. You killed them like they were little more than an inconvenience on your shoe.” Austin’s face is hard, and his eyes flash red.

I don’t speak, my heart fluttering slightly at the sight of the man I love. Without a doubt, Austin won't hurt me. I'm not afraid, even though he is built for death. In one breath, he can snap his uncle’s neck. His humanity holds him back. I sense that about him. Austin might be a vampire, but he's a good man.

“They were different,” Tharthus says, but even I can hear that he isn’t telling the truth. The elven king knows he’s trapped, and there’s no way out. “But fine,” he says, grabbing me by the throat, the spelled knife Doug and Redyrin used appearing in his hand. “If I die, then I’m taking her down with me.”

Austin glances back at the elven woman, who has fallen to her knees. Fear lingers along the lines of her face.

“Get out of the way, you old cow,” Tharthus shouts at Envy.

She lifts her head and neighs, irritated.

“Tharthus,” I say as he tries to drag me with him. With both hands on his arm, my power flares to life. Images of the king’s life dash across my mind. Like a reckoning, I see every deed he’s done, every memory he has, from the time he was a boy until this moment. I witness the whippings his mother gave him. The way his father taught him to take without guilt. If Tharthus showed even the littlest bit of compassion, his father or his mother would beat it out of him. By the time he became an adult, there was only a vast and unquenchable hunger for power. Death would be welcome. I sense that about him, too, though it’s buried deep.

Even though I know he should perish, I can't allow myself to go there.

From beyond the walls, a strange chanting has started.

"Hu! Hu! Hy-huh!"

Leva covers her mouth.

The elven woman's eyes widen with fear.

Envy has moved out of the way, and Tharthus walks us over to the base of the stairs. "Hear that? That's the sound of my warriors. They will come for me, and you will pay for what you've done," he says into my hair. His breath is hot with fury. "Of course, I won't kill you. Your blood is too important to me. But I will use your body, abuse your mind, and make you wish you were dead."

"You will do no such thing," I say, though I don't know where the words come from. Immediately, the crown on my head flares to life, its power causing my skin to tingle.

The voices hiss inside my mind.

You did good, Wysteria.

We will take it from here.

Yes, the time has come for us to separate from you.

Tharthus will become one with us.

We will take him back to ourselves.

Destroy his body and take his essence into us.

Then we will try again.

Yes, try again.

Like we always do.

As we must.

I quake at the voices in my head. Whatever their plan, it doesn't sound pleasant. "You aren't going to like what happens next," I whisper, my voice sounding a lot like the ones in my head.

"Oh, but I think I will." Tharthus tightens his grip.

I swallow in despair as the crown detaches from my head and hovers like a flying disc at eye level. I feel the king tense before he pushes me away and runs for the steps. I whip around, struggling to keep myself upright. The crown skitters around and starts after Tharthus. As it goes, it separates into two dark snakes that become two entities. It's hard to tell whether they are male or female as they zip in and through Tharthus.

The king screams and tries to fight against them, but it's useless. They can't be stopped. He looks at me, his eyes full of terror. The things continue to drive around and through him, growing bigger and bigger until Tharthus is no longer visible. The shadows seed to fade together. Tharthus's cries turn to agonizing moaning before he becomes quiet. It's like they are eating him alive—body and soul, devouring him until he is no more.

When Tharthus and the shadows are gone, I fall against the wall, trying to catch my breath. Whatever they were, I hope I never come into contact with them again.

"What the hell just happened?" Austin is directly behind me, one hand on my shoulder.

At his nearness, I lean into him. "We no longer need to worry about king Tharthus." That's all I can say because I don't know more.

Leva flies in front of my face. "He's gone?"

"Yes," Envy says, shoving her nose past Austin and licking my cheek.

I pat her softly. "Thanks to you," I say and turn, holding out a hand for Leva. I meet the gaze of each of those in the corridor with me. "Thanks to all of you."

OceanofPDF.com

OFF THE SNOW

WYSTERIA

AT THE TOP of the stairs, Austin and the elven woman whose name I learn is Gida step in front of me.

The sounds are even louder, as is the clanging of swords against shields. They bang in unison before those holding them chant the same words over and over. “Hu! Hu! Hy-huh!”

“Why are they doing that?” I ask, working to fight down my nervousness. Since Tharthus is gone, I should be fine, but I’m worried about those who supported the king. How will they react when they learn he is no longer their leader, but I am.

“I guess we’re about to find out.” Austin pushes open the door, rushing out into the sunlight. It gleams off the snow. Gida follows after him, baring her fangs, followed by Leva, then me, and finally Envy. She whinnies nervously and takes to the sky.

Directly in front of us and as far back as I can see soldiers standing together in organized lines. Each is dressed in the same dark armor from head to toe. In one hand is a long sword and in the other and shield. Made of some silver metal, they gleam in the light coming off the snow and from the sky.

The front line steps as one toward us. “Hu! Hu! Hy-huh!”

“Should we flee?” Leva asks.

“They need to know their king is gone,” Austin says, standing in front of me—my vampire protector.

Just having him close eases my mind. He’s alive. He’s close. He’s mine, and I will never be without him again. “I must speak with them,” I say, my words sounding braver than I feel.

“Not until we know they aren’t going to try and kill you,” Austin says, taking my hand in his.

The warmth of his touch leeches into me and trickles up my arm like a happy buzzing. I wish we were alone, but my wish is wasted. There is still much to do. “Only one blade can do that,” I reply, knowing that might not be true. Magic can penetrate my skin, just as Austin’s teeth did. “Let me try.” I press myself against Austin in a hug, pleading with my eyes for him to trust me.

He nods. “I’ll be right beside you.”

I press my cheek against his chest. “I wouldn’t want you anywhere else.”

Together, we walk out into the snowy tundra. I’m not wearing the right shoes for the occasion, but I ignore the snow as it melts in between my toes. Raising my free hand into the air, I shout. “Let me speak.”

They don’t immediately listen, and the front line takes another step toward us. Their faces are stoic and menacing. A warrior in the middle steps forward without the others. “Where is our king?” he demands.

I swallow, nervous about how to begin. To them, I am no one. It doesn’t matter that I am the true heir. How are they to know? Aside from my secret captivity with Redyrin, I haven’t lived in this realm. “I —” I begin but falter as a red circle of magic begins to form in the air beside me. I’ve seen such a thing before when Sage traveled from the human realm to Sharra. This time Snow White steps through.

Dressed in a stunning deep red gown, the bodice is tight, the front laced like a corset with black ribbon. The skirts billow around her. Her lips are ruby red, and her hair is dark as night. Piled on her head and topped with her crown.

She gives me a look, one that says she will take it from here. In her hands is another crown, this one deep blue with sky-blue gems surrounding it. I wonder what that’s for, but don’t ask. Without a word to Austin or me, she walks forward until she’s directly between the army and me. “I am Snow White, queen over all supernaturals, and you will listen to me.” Her voice is strong, confident, and straightforward. I hope one day to be able to address those around me with the same kind of assertiveness.

The one who stepped forward bows. The rest follow suit, giving me a view of just how massive is Tharthus's army.

Even Envy, who is flying in the air, bows her head. Myself and the rest of our little band do the same.

"Rise," Snow White says. Then to the warrior who stepped forward, she asks, "What is your name, soldier?"

His face reddens. "I am Quin, your highness."

"Good to meet you. Please step back in line."

"Yes, ma'am." He immediately does as she asks.

"Now, then. A wicked king has ruled you all for far too long. His was not the line meant to rule your land, and Tharthus has wreaked havoc here. But all of that has ended. Because the rightful heir to the throne is here."

"If you don't mind my asking, who is she?" He looks directly at me.

Snow turns and holds out her hand. "Come here."

I try to pull from Austin's grasp, but he doesn't let go until we are close to Snow. She smiles at him, and he releases me. Snow takes my hand and lifts it into the air along with hers. "This is Wysteria Hart. She is a direct descendent of Devoran, your beloved king."

"Not to step out of line, but how can we know of a certainty? Tharthus said the same thing." The soldier is becoming bold.

I sense Snow's body tighten, but she doesn't let it show. "Because I hold in my hands the crown worn by your king. As the lore goes, only one directly descended can wear it without being cursed to an eternity of pain."

I've never heard the story. Cursed with eternal pain doesn't sound good. I cringe because what if Snow White is wrong?

She senses my trepidation and drops my hand, turning to me. "You need not worry. Without a doubt, you are the rightful heir."

I nod because I have no other choice.

Snow White places the crown on my head. It's heavy, and I imagine it's more than the metal's weight, but the burden of caring for an entire people. When she's adjusted it on my head, she turns. "Your new queen. Wysteria, the Healer, and Queen of the Elves."

Silence permeates the land for several long beats.

Then the front line steps forward and bows.

The rest of the army does the same.

"They are yours to command," Snow White says to me. "I have no doubt you will lead them well."

There is power in the crown, and it increases my sight, allowing me to see each of those in the army for who they truly are within. Most will be loyal, but some still support the king and his desires. They will need to be dealt with, but not today. I release Snow's hand and step in front of Snow and Austin. "You give me great honor," I say, but my voice doesn't carry. I clear my throat and try again. "Today is a new day," I say, digging deep and allowing my voice to be heard by every soul around, including the dead.

The ghost of Devoran makes an appearance and is standing beside the army. There is a smile on his face, one of encouragement.

"You don't know me, but that will change immediately. My first order of business is to heal the realm and free it from the eternal cold." I lift my hands in the air and call forth my power. It's united to the crown, which I now understand is linked to all who've led before me. That influence strengthens me, and I send my healing magic into the air.

A beacon of indigo light cuts straight through the frigidness and shatters into a billion pieces before covering all the land. As it slowly falls like twinkling blue snow, it takes the chill with it. The air turns warm, and the snow melts until all of the snow is gone.

Sounds of excitement and awe pass through the army. Some of those who are still loyal to Tharthus change their mind, and their loyalty turns toward me.

“She truly is the rightful heir,” I hear those in the army exclaim to each other.

Once my magic has healed the entire land, the group, whose numbers have increased exponentially, including hundreds of men, women, and children, watch me in anticipation.

I’m unsure what to say.

As one, all of the elven people chant, “All hail the queen!”

“Is that for me?” I can’t believe they’ve accepted me so readily.

“Only one of Devoran’s direct line can wear the crown,” Austin says, squeezing my hand. “As soon as it was placed on your head, everyone knew the truth.”

I wonder how he knows, but decide I’ll ask him later.

OceanofPDF.com

BLOOD TO SURVIVE

WYSTERIA: ONE WEEK LATER

"Do you, Austin Morrison, take Rapunzel Wysteria Hart to be yours forever and always? Do you promise to love her, cherish her, and treat her with respect and admiration? Do you promise to keep her feelings close to your heart at all times?" Sage watches Austin waiting for him to answer.

I can't help but stare at my soon to be husband as well. The man is hot as hell in his elven garb, including black pants, a long navy jacket with silver accents. His dark hair is combed, though there's a light breeze coming off the water, and it ruffles his hair, making it messy, the way I like it. But it's his eyes—so full of love and joy. I've never seen him so happy, and I know they reflect the way my eyes look.

Even though it's been a week since the Unknowns took Tharthus back to themselves and Snow gave me the elven crown, it feels like only minutes. Because I've been with Austin, and time moves much differently when I'm near the man I love.

"I do," he says, smiling at me.

"Damn good thing," Sage utters, then turns to me. "Are you sure you want to marry a vampire?" she asks her voice heavy with sarcasm. "Gorgeous or not, he needs to drink blood to survive." She rolls her eyes and gags.

Envy whinnies, irritated, nearby. She doesn't feel the same way about Sage as I do. The rest of the group laughs nervously. Vampires aren't well-liked in this realm. But Austin will be. The people may be leery of him now, but that's because they don't know him. Once they do, they'll fall in love with him, the same as I did.

We're in a secluded little area of the beach. Nearby, the waves push and pull lazily while sea birds dance across the sky.

Only the three of us are in attendance, as well as Snow, Dorian, Abernathy, Gida, Envy, my dearest friend Leva and her new boyfriend, Houda. I am surprised Snow and Dorian were able to come. Trolls invaded Sharra a few days ago. Or, at least they tried to. Snow's army shut them down efficiently within twenty-four hours. Ever the peacemaker, Snow, signed a treaty with the creatures and they've returned to their own realm, a new King leading his people. Hopefully, there won't be any more war for a long time.

In this realm, Austin and I formally announced our wedding news and invited all of the citizens to attend a celebration. Even at this moment, thousands are gathered back at the castle. It's like a renaissance fair with singers, musicians, and jugglers. People are selling their wares, all kinds of food, and baked goods. Games are played in the great courtyard by children and adults. It's a glorious day on so many levels, which is why Austin and I wanted our wedding to be a small affair. One last thing that is just his and mine.

When I told Sage that Austin and I wanted to marry, she got the okay from Snow to officiate. Even with her attitude, I have no regrets. She is like a sister to me, and I couldn't imagine life without her.

"Wys?" she asks, shifting a little nervously.

I nod. "Yes. Or course I want to marry him. With all my heart, yes," I say and squeeze Austin's hands.

"Whatever," she says and then smiles. "Then by the power vested in me by the queen of the vampires and all—"

Leva clears her throat as she flies between Austin and me. She's carrying my crown while the one called Houda is holding Austin's.

"Oh, right." Sage snaps her spell book closed, and it vanishes into thin air amid a bunch of sparkles. "You two are going to be queen and king of the elven realm. Let's make it official." Her smile widens. "Houda, please hand your crown to Wysteria."

The pixilette flies over, and I hold out my hands. When I take the crown, the pixilette wipes his brow. The crown isn't light. "Thank you," I say.

He bows deeply. "It is my pleasure, Queen Wysteria." He disappears somewhere behind me.

"Place the crown on your vamp—Austin's head."

I didn't tell her or Austin that I wanted to say a few words, but I do it anyway. "Austin, thank you for caring about me. Thank you for saving me, even from myself. And most of all, thank you for your love. Life was hard after my parents died, even when I didn't remember it. I was a prisoner in a tower and missing out on life. But thanks to Leva," I smile at her. "She rescued me from my prison and brought me to you." My eyes fill with tears. "I love you, Austin." I place the crown on his head, adjusting it until it's just right. The silver crown with seven points looks good against his dark hair, tanned skin, and handsome face.

"Leva, give the crown to Austin."

The pixilette does, then kisses his cheek. She says something to him, but it's so quiet I can't hear. Then she kisses my cheek and flies behind me, presumably so she can be next to Houda. I'm happy those two have each other. Both have agreed to be on my council, as has Envy and Gida.

"Wysteria." He says my name, and I shiver. "You're always keeping me on my toes, and I wouldn't have it any other way. You read my letters," he says and pauses.

In the days since the end of Tharthus, Austin and I talked about them. Well, I apologized, and he kissed away my worries. At that thought, I shudder. The man is such a great kisser.

Austin's eyes darken. "So you know how lost I felt when you were gone. If anything, it was you who saved me. You're easy to love. You make me a better man." He looks at Sage. "A better vampire."

The small crowd chuckles, including Abernathy. The dragon sends a plume of smoke into the air around us.

"With all my heart, I will love you, serve you, and be the man you need for the rest of our days." He places my crown on my head.

Sage produces a blue, silver, and red chord. "Take each other's hands."

Once my hands are in Austin's large ones, Sage drapes the chord on my wrist before wrapping it around our hands and placing the other end of Austin's. Then she utters a spell, and the chord catches fire.

The group gasps and cheers as the chord, which isn't hot at all, sinks into our hands before it vanishes.

"No take-backs, the two of you are bound, body and soul, for as long as you both shall live," she says and steps back. "Austin, you may kiss your queen."

"About damn time," he says and pulls me to him.

His lips brush mine, and I melt.

Everyone cheers.

After congratulations, I walk over to Sage. A week ago, when I told her Austin, and I were getting married, I also asked if she wanted to be on my council. It's a selfish request because I want her to be with me. She said she would have her decision by today.

When she sees me coming, she smiles. "That dress is obnoxious," she says, taking me in.

"How can you say that? You created it for me." I glance down at the exquisite white dress. It's sexier than I would've chosen, the straps thin with a small V in the front and a deep V in the back that goes past my waist. Leva did my hair, wrapping it up in a bun and placing small white flowers that look like roses within. There are similar roses made of material on my dress and down my extra-long train.

She laughs and pulls me into a hug. "You look amazing," she says.

"Thank you." I pull back but keep my arms around her waist. "So?" I leave the question hanging.

She glances down a moment, then meets my gaze. "I can't," she says simply. “I like teaching. Therapy is really helping, and it’s good to be around kids who need me.” She swallows, and I can see she doesn’t want to let me down.

“I understand,” I say and hug her tightly to me again. “Those kids are lucky to have you in their lives. Come and visit again when you can.”

“You better believe I’ll be here often.” She looks at me, mischief on her face. “There’s this elf—Finn is his name—totally hot. He’s already promised me a date.”

I laugh. “So you’re ready to parrrr-tay?” I ask, repeating one of her favorite sayings.

“Definitely.” She giggles and I can’t help but join in.

OceanofPDF.com

FIND HIM

WYSTERIA

THE CELEBRATION WENT on until the early hours of the next morning. By the time Austin and I reach our room, I'm exhausted but don't want to sleep.

"What did Leva say to you during the ceremony?" I've been curious ever since.

He chuckles softly. "She said she'd make my life miserable if I ever hurt you."

I laugh with him. "So she threatened the king? I may have to talk to her about that."

"No need. I think it's sweet she is still protecting you. Plus, I don't intend to give her cause to fulfill her threat." His thumbs brush against either side of my face.

"And Christopher?" I want Austin, but I need to settle the questions pressing against my heart first.

"Gida and Envy left to begin their search. We will find him."

"Good." I turn and kiss the tip of first one of his thumbs and then the other.

"There is still something else on your mind," he says softly.

"Should we return to school and play our duet in the Winter Gala? It's in a few days." I don't care either way. Sage spelled two grand pianos into our main sitting area in the castle to play anytime we want. And other things too. I have this fantasy of making love on a piano. It's silly, but I'm sure Austin will help me fulfill it at some point. Maybe later today.

He trails a finger down between my breasts. "Do you want to?"

It's a simple question, but at that moment, I know the answer.

“No,” I admit. “I thought I wanted to be normal, to live in the human realm, train to be part of the Supernatural Task Force, and live the life my parents always wanted for me. But now?” I rest my hands on his chest. “Now I feel the full force of my place here in the elven realm. With you.” I take his thumb in my mouth and suckle, desperate to get back to kissing and hopefully more. “What if I want a certain kind of pain?” I ask, looking at him shyly from under my lashes. I can’t help thinking about the last time Austin drank from me. There was a little discomfort followed by a lot of pleasure. I want more of that.

Austin’s eyes darken with need. “Well, my Queen, I am here to serve.” He tugs me to him, his lips suddenly on mine. And I’m lost in him as he presses my mouth open and explores me with his tongue. A quiver of hunger flares to life low in my belly. I tangle my tongue with his, and he growls low, grabbing hold of my hips and pulling me close.

I want to wrap myself around him, get all the way intimate, and make love to him, but my dress is in the way. As he trails hot kisses down my neck, I plead, “My dress.”

He looks at me, and his eyes flash red for the briefest moment. “Let me help.”

“Hurry,” I say, knowing with his vampire speed, we can be in each other’s arms in no time.

“No way.” He spins me, so my back is to him, and unzips my gown. “I’m going to take my time.”

I glance at him over my shoulder, no longer the least bit tired and no longer worried about anything but whether or not Austin will be happy with me. “Austin?” I want to ask him because I’m afraid. He’s experienced. I’m not. Will I be a disappointment to him?

He puts a finger over my lips. “You’re perfect,” he says. “Do you want me to draw you a bath?” he asks, his mouth working magic across my shoulder blades.

“Only if you take one with me.” I reach back, desperate to touch him.

“I think I can swing that.” He helps with the straps, and the dress falls into a lavish puddle at my feet. Austin takes my hand, and I step out of it. Then he spins me, so I’m facing him. “You’re the most exquisite woman in the world, my queen.”

I want to offer a snarky comeback, but his hands are on my hips, and his lips are at my neck. I tug his jacket off of him and undo the buttons on his shirt, desperate to touch his bare skin. He senses my need and kicks off his boots before undressing himself. I can’t help but admire him. “You’re pretty damn gorgeous yourself,” I say, walking to him.

He winks, and together we head into the bathroom, where he stops the tub and turns on the water. Filling it will take a while. It’s big enough for more than two. Then he adds some scented oil.

“Are you trying to tell me something?” I ask playfully. It's certainly possible I stink. We danced and danced at the celebration until I was sweaty.

“No, this oil is an aphrodisiac.” He places the bottle under my nose.

“It smells good,” I admit. “But you smell better.” I wrap my arms around his neck, pulling him down so I can kiss him again.

“Is that so?” He caresses my skin, bringing his lips to mine for a brief kiss before he kisses his way along my jaw and down to the vein where my neck meets my shoulder.

My thighs shake at the thought of him drinking from me. “Please,” I whisper.

He doesn’t hesitate and slowly presses his fangs into my flesh. My skin gives way, parting readily for him. It’s uncomfortable, but only for a moment. And then it’s all gratification.

I cry out, my hands clinging to his back as he starts to suck. I kiss his shoulder, his arm, any place I can touch with my mouth. “Don’t stop,” I say.

He does stop too soon, though, and he looks at me with a combination of wonder and exultation. “Thank you for that,” he says, his voice hoarse, some of my blood still on his fangs.

I pull him down and kiss him with all the love in my heart. When we pause briefly, I say, “You never need to thank me. We are one now. My blood is yours.” I wrap one leg around his hip, and he lifts me so I can cling to him with my thighs.

His big hands trail down my back, cupping and caressing as he’s kissing me and suckling until I don’t know where he ends and I begin.

When the tub is full enough, Austin climbs in. Then he holds out a hand for me. As I step into the warm water, I have to admit the scent of the oil is heady. Austin sits. I can’t help but admire his glorious body. Toned. Muscled. Sinewy and massive. I kneel in front of him with my knees on either side of his.

He kisses me again, his tongue filling my mouth, hungry with passion.

As I kiss him back, all I can think is that I’m the luckiest girl in all the realms.

OceanofPDF.com

BOTTOM OF THE OCEAN

WYSTERIA

I WALK ALONG THE BEACH, wearing a loose sundress while carrying my flip-flops in one hand. The warm sand squishes between my toes, soft and fine. Each time a wave comes in, it brings more water. Low tide will soon give way to high. Everything I'm walking on will once again be buried in the crisp and clear water.

The sun has nearly reached its zenith, and I shade my eyes, taking a deep breath, enjoying the salty aroma. It doesn't matter that I was born in the wilds of Wyoming. My heart yearns for the organized chaos that is the sea, despite my years of imprisonment. The sea will always be my happy place. Well, okay, my biggest happy place is in Austin's arms.

My new husband is back at the castle. He intended to come with me, but Gida returned with an update on her search for Christopher. I'm worried about the vampire hunter. How he must be feeling all alone at the bottom of the ocean. Not dead, but not living either. The experience must be terrifying.

At the thought, I glance left, inland, allowing my gaze to travel along, past the trees until I am staring at the top of my tower. The one I spent seven years living in as a prisoner. I used to gaze out at this very view. My heart softens for the girl I once was staring out that window. A lot has happened since then.

Redyrin is dead. The memory of Evan killing her still haunts me. And it's for that reason I've come back to the place where she kept me. I want to speak to her ghost. Envy said she helped—that she was seeking redemption. I have little hope that's true, but I need to try. Redyrin and I aren't blood relatives, but I did consider her my mother before I knew any better. Hopefully, she'll hear my call and do me the courtesy of answering my questions.

I need closure, and I hope by talking to her, I'll get it.

Closing my eyes, I think of Redyrin's dark hair. I imagine her face, her clothes, and the light and sweet scent of her perfume.

"Hello, Wysteria," she says.

I stiffen and look at her. The witch came quicker than I expected. She's wearing her favorite color dress, a burgundy gown with long sleeves and a tight bodice that accentuates her curves. "Redyrin," I say quietly. "Thank you for coming."

"I wanted to," she says, glancing up at the tower. A look of nostalgia softens her ghostly features. "Living here with you was the happiest time in my life."

Her words irritate me. After my parents died, I saw Austin's dad leave my house. He was speaking with another man. Without a doubt, Austin's dad killed my parents. My biggest question is, why? I think I know. He wanted to use me as leverage to return to the elven realm and live like a royal, the same as what Linroe and Evan wanted. That's my theory anyway, but I don't know for sure. I still don't have definitive answers. What I do know is Redyrin took me right after my parents were murdered. It would seem Redyrin was working with Austin's dad, except she must've betrayed him and kept me for herself. That doesn't feel right either.

I could try and summon Austin's dad, Linroe, or Evan. Technically, now that Austin and I are married, his relatives are mine. I casually asked Austin once I found out he can see the dead if he's seen his father. He told me he never wants to. His mother, on the other hand, he's seen her a few times, and I feel his heart healing. I'm sure if I explained to him why I want to see him, that Austin would change his mind. My Vampire King will do anything for me. But I can't be that selfish.

So, trying to summon them is plan B. If I can't get answers from Redyrin, I might do it myself because I need to heal too. "What happened the night my parents died? Were you working with Austin's dad? Did you deceive him so you could use me for your own purposes?" I grind my hands into fists. I want answers. She better give them to me.

"You don't know?" She's surprised, and her face lights up. "But then I guess you wouldn't."

"Know what?" I ask, my teeth clenched together. "And don't lie to me."

"No point threatening me, Wysteria. I told Envy about you. I've been trying to help, to redeem myself." Her words aren't the least bit sincere. Whatever help she offered Envy, it wasn't out of the kindness of her heart.

"Is that so?"

"I came to speak with you, didn't I? I want to tell you everything." Redyrin smiles. "Austin's father, Mack, and I were in a relationship."

She throws the sentence out like she's speaking of the weather. My pulse quickens, but I tamp it down. There's no way Austin knew about Redyrin and his father.

"You're wondering if Austin ever met me?" She shakes her head. "No. Mack felt it best to keep our affair a secret—even from his brother." She giggles then. "The funny thing is, I was in a secret relationship with Linroe too." She brushes some of her hair off her shoulder. "The Morrison brothers are good lovers, as you well know."

What I know is the lengths she'll go to get what she wants. "You used them?"

"I mean, of course, I did." She clucks her tongue. "I knew who they were, and it didn't take much to figure out what they wanted. Neither of them was happy living in the human realm as regular citizens, not when they believed they should be here, living like royalty."

"It was easy to drop a hint here and there about who you were and the opportunity they were missing by not using you to their advantage." She paces back and forth in front of me as she speaks.

I track her, waiting for her to continue. When she doesn't, I ask, "They were in it together?"

Redyrin pauses mid-step and laughs. "Oh, no. Those men were too proud for their own good. One could barely stand the other. Their relationship bordered on passive-aggressive. They would've been pissed if they found out I was sleeping with both of them. So, it was easy to help them develop a plan to get rid of your parents. Mack had resources and was much more efficient." She closes her eyes a moment. "He never told me his exact plan, but even when we weren't together, I tracked his movements. The night he went over to your house, I heard them fighting. I heard the gunshots." Her eyes become two slits of wickedness. "I heard you come home. I watched you go inside. It was important for my spell that you find our parents dead. Seeing such a horrific scene would help with the memory spell I placed on you." She claps her hands gleefully. "And it worked like a charm. Better even than I hoped."

"So, you didn't pull the trigger, but you orchestrated the whole thing." My heart feels like it's going to beat out of my chest.

"That's right." Redyrin sighs. "What I didn't think about was Mack's deathbed confession when he told Linroe what he'd done. That's when Linroe knew I betrayed them both, but it was a moot point because no amount of magic or supernatural power could find me. It all worked perfectly until you escaped." A shadow crosses her face. "All good things must end, I guess." She glances down at herself. "I mean, look at me. Dead. Nothing but a ghost."

"That's the thing about plans. They never go the way you expect them to." Each word comes out in furious anger. If she weren't already dead, I would seriously consider murdering her for what she did to my parents, me, even Austin.

"Very true." Redyrin moves toward me, holding out her hands like she wants to give me a hug.

I sidestep her. "I order you to leave." I'm breathing heavily. It feels like a panic attack is coming on, and I fall into the sand. Water laps at my feet and my back. The high tide will soon swallow me if I don't get up, and I'll be washed out to sea.

"Goodbye, Wysteria. I'll see you sooner than you think." She's gone. I can feel her presence evaporate back to the After Life.

I try to sit, clawing my way away from the water, but I'm seeing spots, and my chest feels like an elephant is crushing me. My vision diminishes, so it's like I'm in a tunnel. All of my efforts are sluggish, and the water is too powerful. I roll onto my back as a wave washes over me. It pushes me toward the shore before pulling me with it back toward the ocean. When the water recedes enough that it's only covering my legs and feet, I roll onto my side, coughing and sputtering.

Before the water can bury me again, I'm lifted into strong arms. "Deep breaths, Wysteria. Come on. In and out."

I blink several times. At the sight of him, I immediately feel better. "Christopher!" I throw my arms around his neck. "Austin is going to be so happy to see you. How did you escape?"

He gives me a broad smile. "You're okay?"

I nod, biting my bottom lip. "Much better." It's true. The spots are gone, and the invisible elephant has left my chest.

"Easy," he says, setting back onto my feet.

When I'm no longer wobbly, I smile. "Gida said Tharthus put you in an unbreakable iron casket."

"I don't know who Gida is, but they are right." Christopher starts down the beach back in the direction of the castle. It's a long walk, especially at such an unhurried pace.

Envy and I made plans that she would come and get me in a few hours.

"I take it your happy to see me too, right sister?" He looks back at me, an enormous smile lighting up his whole face.

“You better believe it. But Austin…” I pause. For the first time I use my healing powers on myself to send away the effects of my panic attack as I run to catch up to him. “I still hadn’t figured out a wedding present yet. You’re perfect.” I take his hand, squeezing it joyfully.

He stops. “Wait, you’re married?”

I nod, feeling my smile grow more prominent. “I love him so dang much.”

He blows out a breath as several emotions change his features before he smiles indulgently. “Very well.” He hugs me tight. “Let’s go find Austin so I can welcome him into the family. Then I can tell you what happened when we’re all together.” Christopher wraps an arm around my waist and starts to run. He doesn’t stop until we’re inside the castle and in the throne room, where Austin is still speaking with Gida.

When Austin sees us, it takes a minute for him to understand.

“Look who I found,” I say, biting my lower lip, beaming with delight.

“I hear you married my sister,” Christopher says, crossing the room and hugging Austin. They clap each other on the back several times.

“She is my everything,” Austin says, glancing at me nervously. “Sorry, you weren’t there to witness our wedding, man.”

“Shit happens. Besides, I wouldn’t want it any other way.” Christopher’s smile fades as he looks at us.

“What’s wrong?” I ask, coming over and hugging them both.

“Isn’t the Winter Gala tonight?” Christopher looks at me and then Austin. At that moment, he seems more like a father than a brother.

“We weren’t going to participate,” I say, shrugging. “What’s the point? We aren’t attending college there anymore. We’re needed here.”

“Nonsense.” He crosses his arms. “Get dressed. The two of you are going to that gala. I want to hear this duet you’ve been talking about off and on for months."

I look at Austin, who smiles.

"What do you think?" he asks.

"Might as well. My aunt and uncle will be thrilled to know we're playing after all."

"Then it's settled," Christopher says, eyeing Gida. "Now, bring me some blood. I'm parched."

OceanofPDF.com

TANGLED CHRISTMAS

OceanofPDF.com

CHRISTMAS DAY

"YOU KNOW it's Christmas Day in the human realm, Wysteria, and we are elves." Austin, who lays beside me in bed, smirks, his eyes twinkling with mischief.

I hadn't thought about us like that before. I mean, technically, he's right. Neither of us is like the elves running around wrapping presents or putting gifts under the tree or anything like we see in Christmas movies in the human realm. But still… "True," I say, rolling onto my side and scooting closer to him. Our bed is enormous. It's easy to get too far away from each other when we're sleeping. "What did you have in mind?" We finished celebrating our biggest gift-giving holiday of the year last night by hosting a ball. There was great music, magic, dancing, and all sorts of delicious food. "Aren't you tired? I thought we'd spend the day in bed."

"Well, my lovely wife," he pauses and brushes some hair off my cheek. "I'm not opposed to that either." He pulls on my thigh, so it's resting on his hip.

Desire tingles throughout my body. How I love him. We've been married for nearly a year, but my intense need for him hasn't lessened. If anything, it's intensified. Austin's eyes darken as he leans up on one elbow, letting the covers fall, revealing his gorgeous chest.

"Wysteria. I need to talk to you." It's my friend, Leva, outside our bedroom door. Her tiny voice is urgent. I might be imagining it, but even her wings beat insistently. She's also on my council. If she's here this early, then something must be wrong in the kingdom.

I'm still new to the job as Queen of the Elves, but it hasn't been so bad with Austin by my side. "Just a minute." I sigh internally as Austin nuzzles my neck, letting me know what I'm giving up.

Austin is a vampire. It's damn sexy and beyond intimate when he drinks from me. My blood has changed him, so he's more like me than he used to be. Not quite a healer, but he can sense what a person needs.

"I'll meet you in the shower in five," I say.

"You better." He grazes my neck with his fangs before rolling out of bed.

A shudder of anticipation runs through me, but I take a deep breath and pull on my robe. At the door, I tie it closed to cover up my nakedness. "Hey, Leva," I say and smile, leaving the door open as I head over to the windows. It's another beautiful day in the elven realm. The trees are vibrant green while the sunlight twinkles and dances across the ocean. "Is everything okay?" I ask when she flutters over and lands on my shoulder.

"In the elven realm, yes. The party last night was epic." Leva smiles. "But—" She pauses and hovers over so I can see her face. Her ruby hair, wings, and outfit shift to azure. She's a rare pixilette. Like a chameleon, she can change colors to blend into her surroundings. "Have you heard of the one called Clara?"

I have. Everyone has. She is another of Snow White's adoptive daughters. "She's ten now, isn't she?" I push the curtains open further, thinking I might want a swim in the ocean today, especially if Austin comes too.

"More like fourteen. She's growing faster than Jasmine did." Leva returns to my shoulder and sits wearily. She celebrated hard last night.

"What about her?" I ask, going over to a chair and sitting.

Leva flutters over to the breakfast table beside my chair. "She's run away to the human realm again, and Snow White has asked that you and Austin seek her out."

"Did she say why us?" I figure it's because Austin is a vampire. But there's Professor Pops and Kenmei, even Christopher, that could help. Professor Pops still lives in the human realm—at least the last time I checked.

“She’s been spotted at the hospital in Gothel Springs. Her sister, Silindra, spoke with Snow, and they both agree that you specifically should be the one to help her.”

I’m about to ask why, but Leva continues, “Since you’re the fountain of youth and you have healing properties, Silindra wants you to heal the rebel out of her.” I hear the confusion in her voice. She doesn't understand the request any more than I do. “Or something like that. I guess they’re worried the darkness in her will win out again.”

“She said that?” Apprehension fills my heart. Clara is an original vampire, and blood is part of her daily diet. My first thought is she’s drinking the blood of the weak. That would be wicked, indeed. “What is she doing there?”

“As far as the informant can tell, nothing nefarious. She was seen reading a story to one child. Helping an elderly man walk around the hospital.” Leva shakes her head. “She’s using compulsion on the doctors and nurses there to remain in the hospital, which, as you know, is against human laws.”

“It seems like she’s doing good, though.” I cross one leg over the other and rest my hands on the table.

“Agreed, but she isn’t supposed to be in the human realm, and she left without asking or telling anyone.” She hugs her arms to herself. “The Vampire Queen and Silindra want you to get to her and… heal her before the Supernatural Task Force, or the chayot find her. That’s the real worry—that they might hurt Clara. The chayot don’t like her and will use any excuse to capture and imprison her.”

“But if she’s doing good…” I continue, still working on wrapping my brain around what’s needed.

“Snow is especially worried about how Clara will respond when cornered or if she feels threatened. Then there could be a fight, and humans might get hurt.” Leva clasps her hands together.

That makes sense, I suppose. “We will leave immediately then.” I stand, but a thought holds me in place. “What if there isn’t any good in her?” There’s no way Austin will agree to kill her. Vampire or not, Clara is a teenager. That’s all he’ll see.

Leva’s eyes get wide, and her shoulders sag. “You are to let Snow White know immediately.”

I’m about to ask what the Vampire Queen will do, but I don’t want to know. “Hopefully, we’ll arrive before the chayot or the Supernatural Task Force.”

“That is Snow and Silindra’s hope as well.” Leva flies over to the door and stops, a curious look on her face. “What do you think happened to the old elven king?” she asks, changing the subject. “I know the Unknowns took him back to themselves, but what does that mean? Do you think he’ll return kind of like Clara? Reincarnated or something?”

“I don’t know,” I say, adjusting the covers on my bed, even though the young elven woman who takes care of our rooms gets flustered when I do her job.

“I hope he never comes back. He was a very bad man.” She flies back over and lands in my outstretched palm, hugging my finger. “Don’t worry about this realm. I can handle things while you’re gone.”

I smile big. “Of course you can. Thank you, Leva.”

She winks, her attire, wings, and hair changing back to ruby red. “Safe travels, Wys.”

As I close the door, I wonder why the Vampire Queen didn’t ask me herself. Not only are we relatives, but I thought we were friends. Maybe she was in a hurry. Not that it matters. Austin and I will go.

At thoughts of my husband, I make my way into our grand bathroom. The shower is running, and Austin is inside. Steam circles his naked form, and I remove my robe. “Mind if I join you?” I ask, stepping in.

Austin ravishes me with his eyes. “Damn, you’re gorgeous.” He pulls me to him, presses open my mouth with his, and nothing else matters.

OceanofPDF.com

FOLLOW AUSTIN ANYWHERE

OUR JOURNEY from our realm to the human one is as easy as stepping through a magical portal. Austin opened it for us near the farm where I first ran into him again after all those years in captivity.

Snow covers the landscape like a shining white blanket. Cows moo with apprehension at our appearance. Each breath comes out in a cloud of warmth.

Austin reaches over to stroke the head of the heifer nearest us. “That’s a good girl,” he coos. It’s the sweetest thing.

Someday he’ll make a great father, I think. Vampire or not, he has an innate goodness and gentleness about him. “They remember you,” I say, watching them flock to him like he’s their long lost shepherd.

“I guess so.” Austin chuckles lightly, walking and caressing their heads as he makes his way over to the fence. Placing one foot up on the rail, he climbs over without missing a beat. His jeans hug his butt and thighs in all the right places.

When I reach the barrier, Austin takes my hand and helps me over. Along with his jeans, he’s wearing a blue long-sleeved shirt and a tan corduroy jacket with matching square toe cowboy boots. His dark hair is still slightly wet and curls at the nape of his neck. “Before we go into town, I want to show you something.”

“Okay.” I’d follow Austin anywhere.

Austin takes my hand and walks us over to the expansive red barn with white trim. The paint is faded and peeling in some spots but still looks to be in decent condition. He slides open one side of the double doors. The odor of hay and farm animals reaches my nose, and I find myself holding my breath. It isn’t bad, just different than what I’m used to.

“We won’t get in trouble for going in?” I ask, feeling nervous. In the elven realm, we have animals, but they aren’t kept in a barn or fed and treated like pets or servants. They come and go as they please. Envy, the black unicorn pegasus who helped save my realm, is also one of my dearest friends and has a place on the council. I couldn’t imagine her in a stall being fed, watered, brushed, and cared for when Austin or I ordered it.

“We’ll be fine.” Austin disappears into the dark interior.

I’m right behind him. Each stall is occupied with… “Are these reindeer?” I ask, as the animals come in close, curious. Some have a fantastic rack of antlers.

“They are.” He nods and goes to the nearest male, letting it smell him before rubbing the pad between his eyes. “This is Dancer.”

“Shut-up,” I say, thinking he’s teasing me.

“My name is Dancer,” the reindeer says, surprising me.

“Um, hello.” I let him sniff my hand, working not to act as shocked as I am. I look at Austin, begging him to explain how this is possible.

“The guy who owns this place lets them winter here every year, though he doesn’t know they can talk.” Austin moves on to the next stall, and a female nickers softly.

“Have you always been able to talk?” I ask Dancer.

It sounds like he laughs. “All reindeer can talk,” he says. “It’s been that way since the beginning of time.”

“I didn’t know.” There’s a basket of apples in between stalls. I pick one out and hand it to him.

Dancer takes it and disappears inside the stall.

“Nice to meet you,” I say and move over to Austin.

“This is Nells. She’s new to the area.”

“Hello, Nells.” I hand her an apple.

She eats, and we move on until I’ve met all of the reindeer, except one. He’s lying in the hay in his stall and breathing heavily.

“Are you okay?” I ask, unlocking the door.

“Don’t go in,” Austin says, but it’s too late.

I kneel beside the reindeer. He is undeniably sick and dying.

“It’s dangerous,” Austin says, kneeling beside me. “Be careful.”

“May I touch you?” I hesitantly reach out a hand to the animal.

At first, I think the reindeer is going to bite, but he just lowers his head.

As my fingers touch his fur, my magic rumbles to life. Instantly, I know he ate something he shouldn’t have. Untreated, the reindeer will die. “It’s going to be okay,” I say, pushing my magic into him. It finds what’s causing his condition, surrounds it, and strangles it until it's gone. I move my hand away as the reindeer stands.

“I feel much better. What did you do?” He shakes himself, sending his antlers precariously close to my head.

“I have healing magic and used it to get rid of your illness.” I glance at Austin, who is pulling us out of the stall.

Once we’re safely on the other side and the door is locked, Austin heaves a sigh of relief.

The reindeer sticks his head over the stall. “Thank you,” he says. “The name is Vixen. I’ve been nauseous for a couple of days. You saved my life.”

The rest of the reindeer in the barn add words of agreement. “It’s no big deal,” I say and smile. “Glad to help.”

I follow Austin to the exit.

“Hey,” Vixen calls.

I turn back. “If you wouldn’t mind, my son, Randy, is out in the cold somewhere. He got sick first, and the farmer wouldn’t allow him into the barn. I’m worried.”

“We’ll find him,” I say. Outside, I breathe in, happy for the fresh air.

“Was it a good idea to promise him that? We have to find Clara,”

Austin says, his gaze roaming the white winter landscape.

“Perhaps if I weren’t with a vampire, there might be a problem.” I snuggle up against him. My head tilted so I can see his face. “You’re super-fast. You can find Randy.”

He kisses me and wraps an arm around my waist. “You’re always right.” He caresses my cheek. “I already did.”

With a literal whoosh, we’re moving so fast. It takes my breath away. Austin stops just inside the tree line, and I have to catch my breath. “Warn me next time,” I say, punching him lightly and putting a hand to my head. My hair is up in a tight bun, and I check to make sure all the pins are still there.

“Where’s the fun in that,” he teases, kissing me passionately.

I get lost in him, letting myself be filled with his warmth and love. And then I hear the familiar sound of a reindeer. “He’s this way.” I take off in the direction of the noise. Sure enough, a white reindeer is lying in the snow, laying on his side. That’s never a good sign. “Hey, boy. Your father sent me to help you feel better.” I step close and squat, reaching out a hand to his face.

He sends out a gust of hot air through his nose. “My dad?” He sounds young. Poor thing.

“That’s right. Vixen is your father, correct?” Carefully I touch the fur on his face. He’s burning up.

Randy closes his eyes, and I feel him give in.

Immediately, my power rushes along my arm and out my fingers into Randy. The sickness is everywhere. He only has moments left to live. Resolute, I send my healing power into him and feel it burn out all the illness. It’s so bad, and his body starts to glow indigo. I glance at Austin, who nods his encouragement.

It isn’t long before I sense the change. He is healing. I keep going until every last bit of the affliction is gone. “There,” I say, patting him softly.

He doesn't move right away.

"Randy?" I nudge him.

"It's gone," he says, quietly. "I feel wonderful, and I'm scared that I'm dead, and this is the After Life."

"You are alive and well." I stroke his soft coat, encouraging him. "Stand up. Come on."

Randy opens his eyes. "I thought you were an angel and that my dad was dead and sent you to bring me to him."

I hear the fear in his voice and feel bad that I wasn't more clear. "I'm sorry, Randy. Your dad is alive, and so are you. Promise." I give him a light smile.

He rolls off his side and springs to his feet, shaking the snow from his fur. Cautiously, he takes a few steps and then a few more before turning back to Austin and me. "I feel like I could fly." As he speaks, he leaps into the air and remains there.

"Did you do this?" Austin asks, surprised.

"What? Reindeer don't usually fly?" I look at my hands, wondering if my magic over-healed him or something else.

"I mean, they do but only on Christmas Eve." He chuckles, and I join him.

"Look at me," Randy says. "This is so totally awesome." He hoots and hollers as he flies around the countryside and back to us. "Thank you," he says, coming over and nuzzling my side softly.

"You're very welcome." I scratch in between his eyes. "Let's get you to your father. He'll be glad to see that you're okay."

Randy takes off at a breakneck speed, then bounds into the sky. "Wahoo!"

Austin and I laugh joyously as he wraps me in his arms, and we travel together after Randy. He doesn't go as fast this time, and I'm glad. It gives me the chance to admire him.

When we reach the barn, Randy is already there and dancing impatiently in front of the door. Austin yanks it open. Randy runs in, calling for his dad.

“Thank you. Thank you,” Vixen says to me after he checks over his son.

“Have a Merry Christmas,” Austin says. We both wave our goodbyes and close the door.

The barn goes wild with pounding feet and snorts and exclamations of surprise—noises that fill my heart with gladness.

“Let’s go find Clara,” Austin says.

“I’m ready.”

OceanofPDF.com

THAT'S A PROMISE

AUSTIN SLOWS to a stop when we are a few hundred feet from the back of the hospital. Hand in hand, we walk around to the front and enter the double sliding doors.

"Now what?" I ask. We're here, but that doesn't mean the nurses and doctors will let us roam around beyond the waiting room without reason.

Or actually…

"Hello, Fern?" Austin waits until the nurse is looking at him in the eyes. "My wife and I want to check on some patients. Let us in, will you?"

Her eyes widen a moment. Compulsion. "Let me get you some visitor badges." She opens a drawer and picks up a pen. "What are your names?"

Austin tells her. As she writes them down, he asks, "Is there a teen by the name of Clara here helping out as well?"

Recognition flashes across her middle-aged face for the briefest moment before she closes down. "I'm not supposed to say."

Austin smiles. "Never mind." Her answer is all we need.

"Here you go, Wysteria and Austin." Confusion fills her eyes. "Who are you here to see?"

Austin catches hold of her gaze. "We are going to look around, but we won't hurt anyone or get in the way. That's a promise."

Her face relaxes. "Thank you, Austin." She presses a button. The door buzzes and opens.

Austin holds it open for me and then follows in after.

The door closes with a click. "You are the most gorgeous and scary man, I know."

Austin chuckles. “Thanks for the compliment.”

It doesn’t take more than a moment for me to remember we are in a hospital full of sick or broken people. Smells of death and dying linger all around us. It burns my nose and causes my heart to ache. An idea forms in my mind. “You go look for Clara. I’m going to visit each of the patients.”

Austin’s eyes soften. “Don’t overexert yourself and save some for Clara. Who knows how difficult it will be to heal the rebel out of her.” He rolls his eyes at the idea. We both agree there’s nothing wrong with a little rebelliousness. It allows for free thinking. At the same time, we get why Snow is worried. “Keep an eye out for the chayot or the Task Force.” He squeezes my hand.

“You do the same,” I say, rising on my toes and kissing his cheek.

He heads down the hall, and I knock on the first door before entering. An older woman is hooked up to a bunch of machines. Her eyes are closed. She already looks dead. Her face slackened in peace. I rest a hand on hers. She’s icy cold. Sunspots and wrinkles cover her aged skin. Without thought, my magic rushes into her, seeking out her ailment.

The woman’s eyes flash open. “Are you here to take me to my Harold?” she asks delicately. “I’m ready.” Her thin lips try to smile.

That’s twice in one day I’ve been mistaken for an angel of death or a reaper. I’m neither. “I’m here to heal whatever afflicts you.”

At my words, she pulls away from me. “Don’t you dare. I’m ninety-two, and my sweet Harold left me more than thirty years ago. I want to go.” Tears push against her lashes. “Please.”

My powers race through her. She is full of cancer and will die very soon. “What about family? Is there anyone you want to see before you go?” I can give her a little more time, at least.

She shakes her head. “My Peggy died a decade ago. She was my only posterity.”

“I understand,” I say. “Are you in pain? At least let me take that away."

She nods. "That would be appreciated."

My magic seeks out and encircles those portions of her illness that are causing pain. I don't heal them but numb her pain receptors.

All the while, the woman watches, focusing on the indigo light before meeting my gaze. "I've heard of your kind."

"My kind?" I ask, puzzled. "There isn't another like me anywhere.

"In possession of magic." I smile, and she goes on. "Do unicorns exist? As a girl, I always hoped to see one. Whenever my parents took me camping, I would spend hours searching."

"Not very many, but yes, they are real."

"Oh, I knew it." She treats me to a toothless grin. "Thank you," she says.

"Have a Merry Christmas," I respond and then feel stupid. She's about to die. There isn't anything merry about that.

"It will be if I get to see my Harold." Her eyes close again.

I leave the room as quietly as possible and head to the next. It's another elderly patient. He looks older than the woman, and he, too, doesn't want to live any longer.

"I've had a good life. My time has come." He pats my hand gently.

"Merry Christmas," I whisper and walk out. I don't know what else to say.

In the next two rooms, it's the same. I'm beginning to think I won't need to heal anyone. Sighing heavily, I open another door, steeling myself. Instead of an older man or woman, it's a young girl with wispy blond hair and vivid brown eyes. She can't be more than seven or eight. Seated beside her is an older girl. Immediately, I know it's Clara.

She looks at me, and I stare back for what feels like an eternity though it can't be more than a few seconds. "Clara, I'm Wysteria," I say, raising my hands.

“You know the angel?” the little girl asks.

“I know her, Sydney,” Clara says cautiously and stands, moving in closer to the girl.

“She isn’t going to take me to Heaven, is she?” Her voice quivers. “I’m not ready to die, Clara. Tell her.”

“She’s here to help,” Clara says. Her eyes question the truthfulness of her statement.

“Yes, I am.” I walk to the other side of her bed. “May I hold your hand, Sydney?”

Sydney looks at Clara for confirmation that I don't mean any harm.

“It’s okay,” Clara says.

Sydney holds out her hand.

I take it in mine. It’s so tiny with very little skin and bone, and I force myself not to flinch as my magic rushes down my fingers and into the girl. All the while, Clara and Sydney watch me. I concentrate on the girl’s fingers as my magic searches for the reason why she’s in the hospital. At her heart, I find my answer. It isn’t strong enough. “Is she on a donor list?” I ask Clara even though it’s doubtful she knows.

She shakes her head.

“It’s too late,” Sydney says, blinking at the water that’s suddenly in her eyes.

“Where’s your family?” I ask, as my magic assesses what needs to be done. I refuse to let this one die.

“I’m an orphan,” she admits and seems embarrassed by it.

“Not anymore,” Clara says. “You have me, remember?” Clara smiles big, encouraging the girl.

“Yes, I do have you as my sister…” Her voice trails off. “But I don’t want you to be sad when I’m gone. It’s better if you aren’t my family.” A single tear drips down and lands on her pillow.

“If Wysteria can’t fix you, then I can,” Clara says, her voice stubborn and determined.

“That isn’t necessary,” I say, knowing she intends to turn the girl into a vampire. “Besides, you’d get into all sorts of trouble.”

“I don’t care.” She wraps her other hand around Sydney’s so that the little girl’s is entirely covered by Clara’s.

“I can heal her,” I say and close my eyes.

Restoring Sydney’s heart isn’t easy. She’s been suffering as the rest of her body got bigger, but her heart didn’t. Still, I push with all my might. In my mind’s eye, I watch the heart reform and become perfect. It’ll last her a lifetime and longer. As I work, the girl’s heart gets stronger but her body is tired and she drifts off to sleep. Her breathing evens out, and the machines that were assisting her heart just stop working.

Even when I’m done, I keep my eyes closed. It’s essential I figure out my next step. I need to touch Clara too and see about her rebelliousness. Her intentions for the little girl were good, but the execution would have caused lifelong repercussions. A child changed into a vampire can never progress mentally or physically.

“It’s okay,” Clara says.

I gasp and open my eyes to see she’s standing directly in front of me. So close. Too close. “Clara,” I say and stumble back.

The teen reaches out and rights me before I fall. “I know why you’re here. I heard Snow and Silindra talking. Go ahead.” She takes hold of my wrist.

“You’re sure?” I hesitate, resting my fingers over hers.

Clara shrugs. “I want to know if I’ll be evil too.” Her face falls. “But, if you can’t heal me or whatever, promise you’ll let me leave with Sydney. She needs someone to look after her. I can do that.”

“Clara,” I begin.

The door flings open. A man and woman block the exit, their faces hard as they look at the two of us. Each of them carries a sword in a sheath across their backs.

“What are you doing?” the man asks, coming forward, his hand reaching for the hilt of his sword.

“Get out,” I order.

But Clara is faster than me. She pushes past the two of them and is gone.

They look at each other and me.

“Where did she go?” the woman asks.

I grab hold of each of their wrists. My magic races through them. They are chayot, and they want to kill Clara. I pull back. “You saw how fast she ran. I don’t know.”

OceanofPDF.com

BRING HER BACK

SYDNEY WAKES and starts to cry. “Where’s Clara?”

I go to her. “She’s okay. She’ll be back.”

The chayot leave. Before the door closes, Austin pushes in. “You found Clara?”

“Yes, but so did those chayot. They’ve gone after her. Don’t let them…” I glance at the girl and don't finish my sentence. She will be upset if she knows Clara is in danger.

“On it,” he says and vanishes.

“He can move fast like Clara,” Sydney says, sitting up. Her skin no longer looks pallid, her lips are rosy red, and her eyes sparkle with energy.

“He’s a lot like Clara,” I say, sitting beside her. “How are you feeling?”

“So much better,” she says and takes in a deep breath. “Better than I’ve ever felt.” She pulls at the tubes and removes one of the sticky nodes on her skin. At the change, one of the machines beeps loudly.

A nurse rushes in. “Sydney, are you alright?” She looks at me like I’m a monster. “Who are you?” she asks as she checks the machine.

“I’m fine,” Sydney says. “And this is my friend, Wysteria.”

“Well, your friend needs to leave.” She glares with irritation.

I go to the door.

“Please don’t go,” Sydney cries.

“I’m going to find Clara and bring her back,” I whisper tenderly.

She doesn’t look like she believes me.

“You’ll see her soon,” I say and exit.

I hurry through the hallway and out into the waiting room. From there, I head outside, and then I'm at a loss. If I were Clara, I'd head for the woods. But she can move so fast. She could be in Cheyenne in minutes. Except she won't leave Sydney. I saw how much she loves the girl.

It's then I hear sounds of grunting and the clang of swords. Fighting. I hurry around to the back of the hospital. The parking lot separates me from the group, but they aren't so far that I can't make out Austin and Clara are fighting the chayot. To the right, I notice another group moving in.

I don't know whether they are more chayot or the Supernatural Task Force. Either way, it doesn't matter. Austin and Clara will be outnumbered. I start running.

Austin sees me, and a look passes between us. He wraps an arm around Clara and shouts one word. "Barn." Then he's gone, faster than my eyes can track.

The chayot look at each other and then at the group coming for them. Swords drawn, the male chayot says something to the group. Obviously, they aren't friends or coworkers.

Before they notice me, I hide behind a giant green trash can.

I know where Austin and Clara are, but it will take me at least an hour to get there if I walk. I could steal a car, but no. I really couldn't. But there is one things I can do. I go back into the hospital and call my aunt and uncle.

"THANKS again for driving me out to where Austin used to work." I watch my aunt, enjoying the vanilla scent of her perfume and the peppermint on her breath.

My uncle is at work, so it's just my aunt with me. She glances over. "I'm just so glad to see you. It's been too long."

I clutch her hand to my chest. "Yes, it has. Are you and uncle doing alright?"

"Oh, yes. We're ornery as ever, but doing great."

“Glad to hear it.”

She flips on some Christmas music. Jingle Bells is playing, and we spend the next ten minutes singing at the top of our lungs. When we reach the turnoff to Herford Ranch, my aunt puts the truck in four-wheel drive. The road is just dirt and deep snow.

At the barn, my aunt parks. “You got it from here?” she asks. She never was one to linger or mince words. Get to work. Get it done. That’s how she is.

“Yes, thank you so much.” I reach over and hug her. “And I promise I’ll bring Austin to dinner next week.”

My aunt beams. “New Year’s Eve, right?”

“We will be there.”

“Good, now I’m going to go talk to Mr. Herford and explain why I came out all this way to see him.” She winks, patting my shoulder.

“You’re the best. Love you.” I open the door and climb out.

“Love you more,” she says and waves.

I watch while she turns the truck around and heads back to the main house. Carefully, I move to the barn door, pull it open, head inside, and close it behind me. While I wait for my eyes to adjust, I listen. Austin and Clara are laughing. None of the reindeer are in their stalls. I continue back until I reach the arena. All of the reindeer stand in a circle, with Clara standing next to Austin. He has a protective arm around her shoulders.

A good dad, I think again.

As I get closer, Austin and Clara turn.

“Come and see. Randy is making a fool of himself,” Clara says in the sweetest way. She’s going to be okay. Snow and Silindra don’t need to worry so much. She’s a good kid.

All the reindeer face me, including Randy, whose antlers are covered in tinsel and Christmas ornaments. He jumps into the air and struts around like he’s the coolest reindeer on Earth. The rest of the reindeer laugh. Even his dad.

“Where did he find the Christmas decorations?” I ask Austin, who wraps his other arm around my shoulders.

“In the loft,” he says and points to an area in the rafters. Boxes are open with all sorts of holiday fare strewn everywhere.

“Well, you look like a tangled Christmas miracle,” I say, loud enough that Randy can hear.

“Aw, shucks,” he says, and they all laugh.

OceanofPDF.com

SHE ISN'T A PET

AS THE SUN starts to set, the three of us say goodbye to the reindeer, including Randy, who asks if he can come to visit.

"Anytime, as long as it's okay with your dad," I say, hugging him.

Out in the cold, Clara takes my hands in hers. "Do it," she says. "Go ahead."

This time, I don't hesitate but send my magic into her. It twists and swirls, searching out anything that might be construed as darkness. It's there, and definitely more than most, but Clara has it contained and doesn't give into it. My magic circles it. Hers, sensing danger, lashes out. Before I can fight it or try and heal it, Clara pulls from my grasp.

"I felt it. I saw what you did." She isn't troubled. "You saw I haven't given in to it, and I won't."

"Yes, but don't you want me to get rid of some of it?" I don't mention there's more in her than most.

She shakes her head. "It's part of me. Resisting has shaped me into the person I am, and I like myself." She smiles. "Besides, while you were in there rooting around with your magic, my magic discovered something about you."

"Let's not get off-topic," Austin says. "Those chayot want to imprison you. You know they don't like you in the human realm. You need to return to Sharra." His voice is calm but firm.

Clara snickers. "I know, and I will, but first I have to get Sydney. She's coming home with me."

"Clara," I begin. "She isn't a pet. You can't keep her like one." I keep my voice gentle.

A shadow of irritation crosses Clara's features. "Sydney doesn't have anyone. She needs me and… I need her. Snow will agree and let her live with us."

Who am I to tell her no. "If it's okay with Snow. You'll ask her first, right?"

Clara crosses her arms. "Of course. I'll go back to Sharra now." She draws a circle in the air, and a portal opens, easy as that. Before she steps through, she hugs Austin and me. "Congratulations," she says.

Austin and I look at each other, confused.

"What for?" I ask.

"You're having a boy." Without another word, she steps through the portal and is gone.

Austin looks at me, wonder on his face. "Is it possible?"

We didn't think we could have children. "I don't know."

Austin kneels in front of me in the dirty snow, resting an ear against my stomach.

I put my hands in his hair, nervously running my fingers through it. "Do you hear anything?" I want to be pregnant more than anything else in the world. The feeling swallows me in such a way that I think I'll be physically ill if I'm not.

He looks up. "We are having a baby," he says, barely contained excitement in his voice. Then he stands and lifts me into his arms, spinning me around as we laugh and cry.

"You're sure?" I ask when he sets me on my feet.

He lifts my face and lowers his head to kiss me, pressing my mouth open, deepening the kiss as our tongues tangle passionately. The man has a way with words, I think, wrapping my arms around his waist.

When our lips part, our eyes meet. His are dark with hunger and with exhilaration.

"I'll take that as a yes," I say barely able to contain my excitement.

"And I'm taking you to bed, sexy wife." He pulls a pin from my hair, tucking it in his pocket.

I lift a brow. "Should we shower first?" I think about the cows and the reindeer and all we've done today.

"You're right. We'll start there." His words are low and sensual as he opens the portal that will drop us back in our rooms in the elven realm and into our happily ever after.

THANK you for reading these fairy tale reimaginings set in the Seven Magics World. To read more in this same world, be sure to check out the grittier and edgier suspense series, Eerie Valley Supernaturals.

Undercover Reaper

Twice Reaped

Reapers Creepers

Deadly Reaper (coming 4/24)

IF YOU'RE interested in the same world but lighter, check out my Broomstick Bay Cozy Mystery series.

Zucchini Cake and Zombies

Wedding Cake and Werewolves (coming 7/23)

Vanilla Cake and Vampires (coming 11/23)

OceanofPDF.com

LEAVE A REVIEW

SIGN UP FOR MY NEWSLETTER

Did you enjoy the Seven Magics Academy Ultimate Omnibus?

Please leave a review.

Join RaShelle's newsletter to stay updated on new releases and be part of her giveaways.

Join RaShelle's newsletter here.

OceanofPDF.com

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

RaShelle Workman is an international bestselling author of reimagined fairy tales, science fiction, time travel, and romantic suspense. All of her novels have been listed on multiple bestseller lists, including her Blood and Snow series (now Seven Magics Academy), which has sold more than a million copies worldwide. Three of her books have been translated into Turkish.

When RaShelle isn't writing, she enjoys baking, creating new taco recipes, and watching her favorite new series. She lives in Utah with her husband, children, and their dogs. Find her online by visiting her website at www.rashelleworkman.org. And sign up for her newsletter to receive free books and get information on book release dates: http://eepurl.com/chMcej.

OceanofPDF.com

ALSO BY RASHELLE WORKMAN

RaShelle Workman's Books in Reading Order According to Series World

IMMORTAL ESSENCE WORLD

YA Science Fiction Romance

Exiled

Destined

IMMORTAL ESSENCE BOX SET

SEVEN MAGICS WORLD

SEVEN MAGICS ACADEMY SERIES

YA Paranormal Reimagined Fairytales

Blood and Snow: Blood and Snow, Revenant in Training, The Vampire Christopher, Blood Soaked Promises

Fate and Magic: Prey & Magic, Masquerade's Moon, Seal of Gabriel, Telltale Kisses

Queen of the Vampires: Love Bleeds, Eye of Abernathy, Resolved to Rule, Vampire Ever After

SNOW'S BITE BOX SET

Deadly Witch: Witch Magic, Witch Land, Witch Time

Royal Witch: Witch Kiss, Witch Love, Witch End

CINDERELLA'S MAGIC BOX SET

Vampire Lies

Vampire Secrets

Vampires and Gargoyles

Vampires and Dragons

Vampire Magics

JASMINE'S WISHES BOX SET

~ ~ ~ ~ ~

SEVEN MAGICS ACADEMY BOX SET BOOKS 1-10

SEVEN MAGICS ACADEMY ULTIMATE OMNIBUS BOX SET BOOKS 1-21 + BONUS CONTENT

BEASTLY SERIES

A Beauty so Beastly

FAIRY ACADEMY SERIES

Hidden Princess

Broken Curse

Stolen Magic

AURORA'S CURSE BOX SET

DEMONLAND SERIES

Alice in Demonland

Alice Fights Demonland

Alice Takes Demonland

Alice Ignites Demonland

ALICE'S DECEPTION BOX SET

ETERNALLY ENTANGLED SERIES

Eternally Entangled

Thoroughly Tousled

Infinitely Intertwined

WYSTERIA'S HEART BOX SET

EERIE VALLEY SUPERNATURALS

Supernatural Suspense

Undercover Reaper

Twice Reaped

Reapers Creepers

Deadly Reaper (4/24)

BROOMSTICK BAY PARANORMAL COZY MYSTERIES

Paranormal Cozy

Zucchini Cake & Zombies

Wedding Cake & Werewolves (7/23)

Vanilla Cake & Vampires (11/23)

FABLE TOWN MYSTERY SERIES

Paranormal Cozy

Iced Raspberry Cookies and a Curse

THE SHADE RASA WORLD

YA Paranormal Romance

WOLF BLOOD ACADEMY SERIES

Initiation

Induction

Inheritance

WOLF BLOOD ACADEMY BOX SET

MAGIC BLOOD ACADEMY SERIES

Elemental Outcast Games: Fire

Elemental Outcast Games: Water

Elemental Outcast Games: Earth

Elemental Outcast Games: Air

Elemental Outcast Games: Shadow

Elemental Outcast Games: Monster

MAGIC BLOOD ACADEMY BOX SET

VAMPIRE BLOOD ACADEMY SERIES

Vampire in Training (8/23)

Monster Trials (9/23)

End Times (9/23)

THE FAIRYTALE CHRONICLES WORLD

High Fantasy Fairytale Reimagining

THE FAIRYTALE CHRONICLES SERIES

Royal Selection

Royal Contract

Royal Keeper (1/24)

Royal Everlasting (3/24)

ACROSS THE AGES WORLD

YA Paranormal Time Travel Romance

ACROSS THE AGES SERIES

Goddess Curse

Mystical Gift

ACROSS THE AGES BOX SET

PARANORMAL INVESTIGATIONS SERIES

Supernatural Suspense

Ghoulish Whisper

OceanofPDF.com